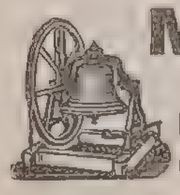
Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.



I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

CHRONICLE

The War.—Beyond skirmishes, the capture of small stretches of trenches, the taking of a few block houses, there is nothing to record in the western theater of the war. No important advantage has been gained by either side. Reims has been once more under a heavy bombardment, and Calais has been subjected to attack by airships; the Germans have attempted to advance in Alsace, and west of Lombaertzyde; the French have been on the offensive, principally in the Champagne district, and in the vicinity of Apremont; but nowhere has any notable or permanent success been achieved.

Bulletin, Feb. 23, p. m.-March 2, a. m.

The costly retreat of the Russians has come to an end. They have reorganized their line and are holding firm along the rivers Narew and Bobr in northern Poland. Northwest of Grodno they have resumed the offensive, and they have driven the Germans from Przasnysz, which the Germans had succeeded in occupying. It would seem that the Russians have somewhat the best of it at present, although their claims of having forced the Germans to retreat all along the line must be accepted with a good deal of reserve, because Berlin reports that nothing important has taken place in the North Poland area. This much, however, is certain: the German offensive in the north that was reported to have acquired such momentum has been checked. The main difficulty which militates against its success is the lack of those railroad communications which have hitherto enabled the Germans to concentrate at strategic points forces superior to those of the Russians. It has been conjectured that the German plan was to secure positions beyond the eastern border of East Prussia, and then make every endeavor to force their way south far to the east of Warsaw, in the hope of meeting the Austrians who are making such efforts to drive northward the Russians. To do this it would be necessary to penetrate the line of strong fortresses that stretch along the Narew river from Novo Georgievsk through Lomza and Osowiec to Grodno. The capture of Przasnysz and the severe attacks on Lomza and Osowiec pointed for a time to the possibility of success. The fact, however, that the Russians have resumed the offensive would seem to indicate that there is little probability of the Germans achieving their object at present. The Russians, it appears, have been able to mass sufficient troops all along the line that extends from the Vistula to the Niemen, to block any serious advance of the Germans. But the Kaiser is said to have a million men on this 180-mile front, and the new campaign south of the East Prussian border is likely to be a bloody one. West of Warsaw there have been no noteworthy developments, but there are indications that point to a renewal of the German offensive.

Poland and Galicia

In Galicia stubborn contests have been in progress on the upper San, south of the Dniester, and especially in the Carpathians, where the Austrians say they have taken many thousands of prisoners, and the Russians claim to have forced the Wyzkow pass and to have penetrated into Hungary. In Eastern Galicia the Russians report that they have recaptured Stanislau and Kolomea. In Bukowina there has been no change.

The most important event of the week has been the fall of the outer forts that guard the entrance to the Dardanelles. The allied fleets of France and Great Britain by a heavy bombardment have succeeded, after two months of intermittent effort, in destroying the Turkish fortifications on both the Asiatic and European sides of the mouth of the strait. This feat is in itself of great importance, as the three forts that have been destroyed were among the strongest in the world. Of still greater significance, however, is the fact that the way is now open to operations against the rest of the strait. These operations have already begun. Destroyers and other small craft have been sent ahead to remove the mines with which the long, narrow strip of water that connects the Ægean with the Sea of Marmora has been carefully and liberally strewn. Following them is the Anglo-French fleet, which will continue its attempt to reduce the rest of the fortifications. This will be a difficult task, as the heights which line the passage are not only supplied with batteries, but are themselves a strong natural fortress, having a height that reaches in places to not less than six hundred feet. But the guns of the fleet outrange the guns of the batteries, and as the Turks are without submarines, the task does not seem to be impossible. In fact, it is said to have been at least half accomplished by the destruction of the outer forts. If the Sea of Marmora can be reached the fall of Constantinople would be inevitable.

From its fall the Allies would derive very great advantages. The unrestricted passage from the Mediterranean to the Black Sea would render possible the transportation of guns and ammunition to Russia. For a long time it has been asserted that Russia's need has been, and is, not men, but military supplies, and that the worst losses inflicted by the Germans were not the loss of soldiers, but of arms. On the other hand, immense bodies of Russian troops could be transported to the western theater of the war, which undoubtedly would increase very considerably the Allies' prospects of success. Then, too, there are said to be large stores of wheat and rye on the shores of the Black Sea, waiting for shipment to the armies of France. Add to this the fact that the Turkish demonstration against Egypt would come to an end, and so leave about one hundred thousand British troops free to be used against Germany. All this points to the probability of the Allies being ready to make great efforts and sacrifices in order to capture Constantinople.

Constantinople

A great deal of speculation has been indulged in as the result of a statement made by Sir Edward Grey in the House of Commons. Referring to certain aspirations voiced by the Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, which have arisen as the consequence of events on the Russo-Turkish frontier and which seem to "bring Russia near a realization of the politico-economic problem bound up with Russia's access to the sea," Grey said: "With these aspirations England is in sympathy. What form their realization will take will, no doubt, be settled in the terms of peace." Russia has two aspirations connected with access to the sea: a port in the Baltic, which remains open all winter, presumably Danzig; and Constantinople, with the attendant free passage through the Dardanelles for her warships. England has persistently blocked the accomplishment of Russia's attempts to take possession of Constantinople, and this for very obvious reasons connected with her supremacy in the Mediterranean. Perhaps this is her reason for pressing the campaign against Constantinople, and not waiting until Russian armies have beaten back the Turkish resistance in the Caucasus and have advanced upon it from the east. Her power to dictate the future status of Constantinople would be much greater if she and not Russia had captured it. No one thinks that Great Britain would willingly see Russia master of the Turkish capital. Hence, Sir Edward Grey's guarded language. Rumors have been telling of a growing discontent in Russia over the disproportionate sacrifices Germany has made her pay for her alliance with France and England; and those who read the signs of the times have found in the profession of sympathy by England's spokesman a bait and a promised reward which would inspire Russia gladly to make still greater sacrifices.

Russian Aspirations

The Dacia has been seized by the French Government in the English Channel and taken to Brest. The sinking of ships in the war zone is steadily proceeding. Among the steamers sent to the bottom is the Carib, another American cotton ship. The German Admiralty officially reports the sinking of a British transport with troops; this, however, is denied at London. The American Government has suggested a plan to Germany to obviate the present peril to American shipping. But success is extremely unlikely. The French and British Governments have notified our State Department that they intend "to frame retaliatory measures in order in their turn to prevent commodities from reaching or leaving Germany."

Other Items

Austria-Hungary.—A message has been sent by the Emperor to the Presidents of the Austrian and Hungarian Ministries. It is an expression of his gratitude to the people of both realms for their loyal and self-sacrificing attitude during the war. He assures them of his conviction that with God's help a peace will be brought about worthy of the toil, sufferings and dangers that have been undergone. The hopefulness of the Emperor is reflected likewise in the Austrian press, which even now seems hardly able to realize the changes that have suddenly come about in the entire country, the unity that has followed upon almost hopeless political and national confusion. Panslavism is dead. "We have become greater in this war, and full of assured dignity," is the judgment of the Historisch-politischen Blätter. Men have learned to view in a new light the virtues of obedience, religion and sacrifice; women have become heroines of charity. "All is common, joy and sorrow, life and death." In this new unity and brotherhood the writer sees the glorious rebirth of Austria. "We recognize in this singular providence the finger of God, who in the midst of the dreadful storm of war has bestowed upon us this precious gift of national peace." He therefore regards the war as a visitation of the most merciful kind and exclaims, in reference to the blessings it has brought and the hopes it has awakened: "Is it not a joy to live in this great time?" A truer valuation of life, he believes, has superseded the striving after merely transitory things.

France.—According to reports from Paris, more than half of the seventy camps in which German prisoners are detained have been inspected, by request of the French Government, by competent attachés of the American embassy. These inspectors were permitted to examine the lodgings and the arrangements made for the care of the prisoners and, of course, to talk to them without the presence of a French official. These reports, which are confidential, will be forwarded to Washington. Complaints made by some of the prisoners were submitted to the French authorities, and official assurance has been given that the cause of complaint, if justified by thorough examination, will be removed at once. At best, military detention camps do not furnish luxurious quarters, but it is said that the conditions in the French detention camps are humane, and that the Government is doing all that can reasonably be expected to lighten the hardship incidental to the situation.

French Detention Camps

Germany.—Among the preliminary budget estimates adopted by the Federal Council is an item of 10,042,000,000 marks, or $2,510,500,000, for extraordinary expenditure. The purpose of this sum is to provide for the possibilities of a prolonged war. Almost the entire amount will be raised by loans. Germany is financially well prepared to meet the difficult situation. The president of the German Government Bank, who some time ago received an honorary degree from the University of Bonn, said on the occasion: "I do not merely hope, I know, that we are in a condition to carry through this mighty war both in the domains of finance and economics, and that we are equal to all demands no matter what its duration may be." In anticipation of the millions of forces that the Allies may be preparing for the opening of the spring campaign, Germany is said to hold at present more troops in readiness at home than it ever had during times of peace. The uncalled Landsturm, moreover, will furnish several millions, not counting the men in the field or the reserves who are filling all the barracks and training places. Should the desired peace be long delayed it is evident that the cost of defraying these expenses will be enormous. "Trust in God and persevere!" is the motto given to Germany by Cardinal von Hartmann. Calling on the people to place their confidence in "our just cause, our brave army and our noble Emperor," he exhorts them above all material means to trust in the God of battles, "to whom with faith and confidence we address our prayers."

Men and Means

Great Britain.—Cardinal Bourne recently returned from a visit to France, where he was received by the troops with great enthusiasm. The Cardinal's Lenten Pastoral is an eloquent and patriotic appeal to the Catholics of England "to fear God and honor the king." Referring to critics who, in past years, professed to discern, "not without some ground," signs of decadence in the British Empire, the Cardinal writes:

The Cardinal's Pastoral

> The events of the past six months have done much to dispel all such forecasting of the future. A latent spirit of heroism; a deep sense of duty; a strong love of empire and country; a readiness to sacrifice comfort and ease; a willingness to give up even life itself, in order to hold intact what our forefathers have won and bequeathed to us: all these qualities have made themselves manifest in a degree that few suspected. It would seem to be according to Divine Providence that our country should still have a far-reaching mission to fulfill, and that all the nations which make up the empire should be brought into closer union of aim and purpose.

Owing to obvious difficulties, the Cardinal dispenses his people from the observance of the laws of fasting and abstinence, even on Fridays, throughout Lent, with the exception of Ash Wednesday and Good Friday.

The insistent demand of the Government that work be resumed at once in trades which had taken over contracts for the army and navy has had a salutary effect in bringing labor conditions in general to a state more nearly normal. The union officials wisely advised the men to return to work at once, and this advice has, in most instances, been followed. Other threatened strikes have been averted, the strike of the Liverpool dockers is at an end, and it is reported that similar labor difficulties, which for a time threatened to be serious, have been satisfactorily arranged.

Strikes Concluded

Ireland.—The Weekly Freeman, under date of February 13, announced that the population of the country increased 5,000 last year. "This is the first year since the great exodus began at the end of the forties, in the last century, that the population has increased." Heretofore, for the past 65 years, the complete census has always shown a decrease. In the course of a very interesting article on the subject the paper quoted remarks that, if the number of those who returned to Ireland were included in the figures, the increase would be not 5,000, but 10,000. During the past twelve months the number of Irish-born men and women that left the country fell off by 30 per cent., while the number of those who returned increased. All told, the latter totaled 8,045, as compared with 5,940 in 1913, an increase of 35 per cent. Four thousand seven hundred and forty returned from the United States; 3,060 from all the British colonies—of these 1,593 were from Canada. In addition, 232 persons of foreign birth took up permanent residence in Ireland.

Increase of Population

It is to be hoped that this record may be always sustained, so that in time Ireland may come into her full inheritance of glory and power.

The papers are still commenting on enlistments. A recent Leader has an amusing article on "Carson's braves" in County Monaghan. A great Union recruiting meeting was held in Monaghan Town Hall; the "braves" marched to the hall in a body, wearing haversacks and belts. There were speeches by Commander-in-Chief Richardson and others; "everybody was enthusiastic, everybody applauded, but the net result of enthusiasm and applause was four recruits." The local organ of Unionism sobs over conditions and exclaims:

Enlistment

> And to think that out of this large body, after listening to the speeches made and the reasons advanced why they should come forward to aid their country, only four were found possessed of the manliness and spirit sufficient to enable them to do so is, in our opinion, a reflection on the Ulster Volunteer Force in this county which can not be explained away or glossed over.

Yet these same "braves" were willing to shed the very last drop of their blood a few months since in war against their fellow-countrymen. Perhaps the "shedding" was to be done by speeches and "scare head-lines." Unionists in England can learn a valuable lesson just now.

Mexico.—The following abstracts are from letters received by the editor of AMERICA from friends in Mexico. He stands sponsor both for the probity and knowledge of the writers and the accuracy of the citations which, indeed, give only a faint idea of the wretched conditions of the Mexicans:

Pitiful Conditions

> Some mornings ago I was awakened early by an unusual noise on the stairway approaching my apartment. I threw on a cloak and went out. A tiny Mexican child, scarcely more than an infant, was sitting on the top step calling words of encouragement to some one below. I looked down and saw an old woman crawling upward slowly, so weak and wasted with hunger and age that she was unable to stand when she reached the landing. She had crawled on her hands and knees along the corridors and up two flights of stairs to the only help she knew. Later investigation showed her to be one of the heirs to an estate subject to the manipulations above described, and easily worth $2,000,000. . . . There is also good reason to believe that all northern Mexico is being oppressed and robbed in a systematic and cold-blooded manner. I could give many cases which seem to indicate this; one will suffice: I am well acquainted with a Mexican until recently engaged in the business of exporting hides. He is a quiet, intelligent citizen, and before the beginning of the revolution demonstrated his value to his country by the successful management of a number of enterprises. He has a wife and three children. . . . I had not seen this man for some time; a few days ago he came to visit me. He is a powerfully built person and every movement is expressive of strength and vitality, but this time he came in languidly and dropped into the first chair he could find. There was scarcely a vestige of color in his face. He wasted no time in preliminaries, but told me he had decided to fight on one side or other. I asked him the reason of his sudden decision. He replied that the customs officers had refused to allow his hides to pass; he had sought work in vain; he was starving; he would join the army, and as long as anything was left, take what he needed. . . . I noticed he had a surgical bandage around his wrist and questioned him about it. He broke down completely and told me the rest of his story. He had received a letter the day before from his wife telling him that one of his children was sick and asking him to send money for food and medicines. He went to his room and, in desperation, slashed his wrist, wrote a letter to his wife in his own blood and threw himself down to die. He was found before it was too late; and now he is taking up arms because there is nothing else to do. I inquired what is being done with the hides? "Well," he replied, "they are not worth much now. Mr. ——, an American, is buying them for $2.00 each (the market price is $7.00). What has happened in this case has happened many times before in the case of fruit, cotton-seed and other commodities. No sooner is it known that there is anything to be sold, when an American gets the commodity at his own price; the military authorities take the money paid, the previous owner of the goods can take a gun and fight or starve.

Apropos of the recent expulsion of the Spanish Minister and Washington's notifying Carranza that we view with "keen displeasure" the murder of Spaniards, Charles M. Pepper sends the Boston Evening Transcript some valuable information regarding the Spaniard's position in Mexico:

The Spaniards in Mexico

> Spain has every cause for solicitude. She has been the innocent victim of circumstances. With the possible exception of the United States, there are more Spaniards in Mexico than foreigners of any other country. . . . Spaniards in Mexico are hated by the Mexican peons, because they were property owners, and they are also the creditor class. Carranza's highly cultured entourage hate them because their wealth gave them a certain political influence under the Diaz régime. The peons hate them as a class because they are thrifty. Those who were not large property owners, or engaged in big enterprises, were grocers and storekeepers, that is, retailers. They sold their goods on credit, but the time came when they demanded payment, and that made them excessively unpopular. The confiscation of the property of the Spaniards wherever the revolutionists came into control was therefore something in the nature of an orgy. If the unpopular Spaniards saved any of their property it was by an arrangement with the chiefs. While many Spaniards have left Mexico, the majority of them have been unable to get away. Hundreds are in remote communities where the feeling against them is still bitter, and their lives are in constant danger. When the Huertistas were overthrown, the revolutionists justified their severities toward the Spaniards on the ground that these were in sympathy with the "usurper's Government." The Spaniards were like the other foreigners. They recognized whatever de facto administration was in power. They did not, however, conspire to keep it in power. . . . Whatever faction they might give allegiance to to-day was likely to be ousted to-morrow, and the new faction was sure to treat them as "enemies of the Government," and after taking whatever remaining property they had, was as likely as not to murder them.

Unless a great European war were now raging, Spain's insistence that we live up to the Monroe Doctrine would probably receive more attention.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Capital Punishment

THE new warden of Sing Sing, lecturing at one of our most prominent hotels in New York City, one night recently, before a select audience of University people, said something that sent a rather disagreeable thrill into his audience. As reported, he asserted: "Every time I give the signal for an execution at Sing Sing, every one of you is guilty of murder. Don't forget that." The warden's idea in calling New Yorkers murderers, is that capital punishment is against the law of God. According to him, the State has no right to take the life of any man, and every citizen of the State shares the responsibility for the legal, but unjust, killing whenever there is an execution at Sing Sing.

The new warden has been very prominently before the public lately and needed no such sensational expressions to give him added publicity. Needless to say such intemperate language is not at all likely to give the ordinary thinking citizen of this State more respect for the new appointee. There are a very great many who were quite sure when he was appointed that his largely academic attitude toward crime and criminals would almost inevitably bring about his failure to manage properly the New York prison, to whose headship he was chosen after a week's experience as an "amateur" prisoner. We all knew, however, how many serious abuses existed at Sing Sing. Most of them were due to over-crowding. Whenever institutional quarters of any kind are over-crowded it becomes almost impossible to eliminate abuses, and these gradually grow worse until an almost intolerable state of affairs results, and then reform has to come. This was the condition of things at Sing Sing, and we hoped sincerely that the new warden would be able to bring about the needed reforms. He had the sympathy and good-will of every citizen in his effort. Such uncalled for expressions as that quoted from this address, however, are sure to alienate the sympathies of good citizens and to meet with approval only among the criminal classes.

Mr. Osborne's suggestion that capital punishment is a violation of the law of God, that the State has no right to take the life of man, and that every man has the right to live and atone for the sins he has committed, would be amusing, because of the ignorance of philosophy and ethics that it involves, did it not come from a man who should have an exact knowledge of the ethics of penology. The trouble with a great many men in our time is that they know nothing about what was written, long before our time, on the subjects with which they are occupied. The new warden of Sing Sing sees how he can reform certain abuses in prisons, jumps to the conclusion that he must reform the whole world in the matter of prisoners, and judges that all who have thought about this subject before, if, indeed, any one did seriously think about it, were entirely wrong.

The one question that we are interested in here, however, is capital punishment. There are many people in our time who are taking part in the movement to bring about the abolition of the death penalty. Some of them insist, like the warden of Sing Sing, that the penalty is unjust. Some are opposed to it because they say that it has failed. They point out that when there were some sixty felonies, all punishable by death, under the earlier English common law, this did not prevent the frequent commission of the crimes to which the death penalty was attached. Now that capital punishment is inflicted for the taking of human life only, they argue that this extreme punishment does not deter the premeditating criminal, and that, as the one redeeming quality of punishment is, and ever must be, to secure a lessening of crime, this form of punishment should no longer be maintained in our laws. Above all, they insist that, as at intervals, however rare they may be, an innocent man suffers the death penalty—a mistake which can not be rectified—organized government must not take any such irreparable risk in the infliction of punishment.

As to the question of the injustice of capital punishment, that is nonsense and does not need to be discussed here. The question of the value of capital punishment as a deterrent for murder can only be answered from the experience of mankind. Baron Garofolo, Procurator-General at the Court of Appeals of Venice, who has spent all his life in the magistracy which forms a profession by itself in Italy, is one of the authorities on this subject. His book on criminology was selected for publication under the auspices of the American Institute of Criminal Law and Criminology in the Modern Criminal Science Series. The Baron has written extensively on criminal subjects, and is, too, a professor of criminal law and procedure. His book on criminology has gone through many editions. It appeared first at Naples in 1885, and has already passed through no less than five editions in French. Our American edition of 1914 is, by the author's wish, taken from the fifth French edition.

Garofolo has no doubt at all about the advisability of continuing the death penalty. He quotes from experiences in Italy. A formal outbreak of brigandage, which occurred in the south of Italy in 1861, was put down only by the summary shooting of convicted offenders. In Belgium murder increased "in an alarming manner as belief in the abolition of the death penalty became more and more fixed in the popular mind." A procurator-general of that country attributes this increase to a return to the practice of systematic pardoning. In Switzerland, as the result of the abolition of the death penalty in 1874, there ensued an increase in murder, estimated at seventy-five per cent. for five years alone—a circumstance which decided many of the cantons to reestablish the punishment in question. In Prussia, where for many years scarcely any executions have taken place, the criminal statistics exhibit a continual growth in the number of homicides during the past fifty years. The crime more than doubled in the twenty-five years from 1854 to 1880. In France, experience showed that when capital sentences are carried into execution, murder decreases and the opposite is true when the death penalty is not inflicted. England has the death penalty, Italy has not. England has only one-tenth as many murders as Italy. We have more than ten times as many murders in this country as England has, but then the English execute nine-tenths of their murderers, while we execute only two per cent. of them. Our murder rate in this country has gone up, fearfully in recent years, until now, as has been said, the United States is worse than vendetta-ridden Corsica in the number of its premeditated murders.

The main reason for the wave of feeling against the infliction of the death penalty in our time is due to the gradual decrease of belief in immortality, and in a hereafter of reward and punishment. To any one who is firmly convinced that the human soul is not immortal the death penalty is, indeed, an awful punishment. The unbeliever can scarcely understand how the State can dare to take a human life, since that is putting an end to existence. He who believes in immortality, however, knows that, after all, life here on earth is only one stage of an endless existence, and that the taking of life under proper circumstances may, therefore, confer a real benefit on the individual. A man facing the death penalty for a certain time and then suffering it, may thus be predisposed to begin another stage of existence much better than if he were allowed to drag out a further disordered existence here. Apparently there are very few people who realize that a great deal of the present discussion on capital punishment, as well as of the maudlin sentimentality over the condemned criminal, is really due to the loss of belief in immortality. The realization of this will make many believers chary of sharing the agitators' sentiments without good reason.

There is just one thing to be said about the death penalty. We all want to see it abolished, that is, we should all be very glad to have the time come when it would not seem necessary to inflict it. If it is to be abolished, however, then the reform must begin with the criminals themselves. They must not murder for some real or fancied wrong that has been done them. Premeditated murder, human experience teaches, can be stopped best by the thought of the danger of death it involves. The reason why the death penalty did not deter from felony in the older days was that the great majority of those who committed felonies escaped detection. Moreover, law was so poorly enforced and the apparatus of law so little organized, that practically any one might hope to escape. The death penalty to be effective must be sure, ought not to be delayed and ought to come while the memory of the crime is fresh in the minds of the community. What we need now is prompt justice. The man who himself has murdered another proclaims the law that his life is sacrificed to the community.

Temperance against Prohibition

OF the many curious fads which in our day occupy the public's mind, the prohibition fad seems at the present moment to have outdistanced all others in its efforts to attract general attention. That there are numerous weak links in our social armor is obvious: divorce, neo-malthusianism, peculiar business methods, and inordinate love of pleasures, lawful or otherwise, are playing havoc with our citizens. Yet while this is apparent to all, at the same time little or no serious effort is being made in the non-Catholic world to correct these fundamental evils of American life. On the contrary, the camels of iniquity are allowed a clear field and all the favors, while a most ardent chase is always in progress after the unfortunate, and much less dangerous gnats.

Thus it comes that the decalogue is no longer up to date. "Thou shalt not kill," in certain contingencies, is of less moment than "Thou shalt not drink wine"; "Thou shalt not commit adultery," is on a par with "Thou shalt not use tobacco"; whereas, "Thou shalt not steal" appears of less consequence to a class of reformers than "Thou shalt not play Sunday baseball." This list of man-made commandments might be prolonged indefinitely merely by glancing over one of the slang-exhibits called sermons of a modern "evangelist."

But for the present I am more concerned with the prohibition precept than with the other freak substitutes for the code of Mount Sinai now in vogue. The latest State in which an attempt is being made to join the procession, strangely enough, is the steady, conservative old Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. For a few days ago a Constitutional Amendment of the following tenor was introduced in the House of Representatives at Harrisburg, where the State legislature is now in session: "The manufacture, sale, barter, or exchange of intoxicating liquors or beverages, whether spirituous, vinous, malt or brewed, is hereby forever prohibited." Should this amendment be adopted the procuring of wine for the Holy Sacrifice would be rendered impossible in Pennsylvania, and we should have reached the advanced stage of "progress" now being enjoyed in that enlightened infant among States, Arizona. It is scarcely probable, indeed, that in the Keystone State we have yet arrived at the degree of perfection necessary for the acceptance of a measure so well calculated to put us, while still on earth, in the third, if not in the seventh heaven. But at all events we have made a beginning, and the village Hampden, who has thus immortalized his name, may yet live to see a statue erected in his honor on the banks of the Kishquoquillas. Meanwhile he will have the eminent satisfaction of being the hero of innumerable spinster gatherings, perhaps even a keen rival in the rural communities of this Commonwealth of the immortal statesman who discovered grape juice as the most potent nurture of the Dove of Peace.

Now, that there is urgent need of legislation, to prevent the grave abuses connected with the manufacture and sale of intoxicants in the United States, is manifest. But our chief national characteristic in law-making seems to be an inordinate love of extremes. I suppose most of our States, for instance, have passably good liquor laws. Are these ever seriously enforced? A year or two ago, in a city which shall be nameless, through the efforts of the District-Attorney, a condition of things that had existed in several hotels for a number of years was brought to light which was simply appalling. The public was shocked, naturally enough, and the prohibition stock in consequence went up several hundred per cent. But it did not seem to occur to anybody that if the police had been doing their duty the condition deplored so rightly would never have existed. And why did not the police do their duty? Simply because they were inefficient. The chief qualification required in their selection was ability to get votes. Moreover, their appointment was only for the term of a mayor; their reappointment depended upon their usefulness to the candidate of their choice at the next election; and consequently they dared not, if they would, enforce the law in the case of the low saloon-keepers, whose influence is so useful at the hustings. Of course, the remedy for this vicious circle is known to all: Civil Service. Nobody, however, reformers included, would dream of advocating the adoption of this corrective, and therefore, instead, we decided to make the last state worse than the first.

I have often wondered what the average present-day Protestant church-member really thinks of Our Lord's action in changing water into wine. And when you remember that the quantity of water thus affected at Cana of Galilee was simply enormous—not less than 84, and possibly as many as 162 gallons—according to the "measure" used, then my curiosity increases. I say the individual Protestant church-member, for it is perfectly clear that if Christ were on earth at this moment and, let us say, while attending a wedding in the foreign section of Philadelphia, changed water into wine, the very last drop of the vials of Billy Sunday's wrath would be poured out in denunciation of the Son of Man. Of course, such a thought as this never occurs to the well-meaning and, after his manner, sincere and pious Prohibitionist. But this does not alter the fact that Our Lord on earth to-day, after such a miracle as that at the marriage feast, would be denied membership in most Protestant churches from Maine to Florida. Is it necessary even to hint at the family resemblance between this point of view and that of the rigid observers of the law, who were so severely denounced by Christ nineteen centuries ago? And is it necessary, in addition, to say that Our Saviour's rebukes of pharisaism have met with the unanimous approval of the world ever since?

Now these vagaries of well-meaning men and women would be amusing enough were not the consequences of their irrationalism so serious. In the first place the extremes to which they incline, at once alienate millions of moderate citizens who would gladly cooperate with them in an effort to obtain reasonable reforms. Practically all Catholics, for instance, would approve of placing every useful restriction on the sale of drink, and of the strictest enforcement of the laws enacted to this end. But, just at the outset we are met with an impossible program which would prevent us from saying Mass, and which in consequence is radically anti-Christian. Is it not high time that sensible men of good will should organize and give a quietus to this midsummer madness which is nowadays called "reform." The success thus far achieved by the radical fanatics is, I think, chiefly due to one cause, namely, that nobody wants to come out as an advocate of what the Prohibitionist would stigmatize as "the liquor interests." But what I would propose is just the reverse of this. I would, in the first place, abolish the present type of bar altogether, and permit wines and light beers to be distributed only in restaurants. In the second place I would, if anybody particularly wanted it, prohibit the manufacture of all other liquors altogether, though personally I think it would be preferable to allow the sale of these with restrictions; I would never, for example, allow them to be consumed on the premises. This I consider a practical program of temperance reform, which would go far toward a real solution of the liquor problem. But, on the other hand, if the fanatics get their way through the supineness of the moderate element in American public life, I greatly fear, first, that national prohibition is only a matter of time, and second, that, as a consequence, a quarter of a century hence will see the United States a nation of drug-fiends.

Among the Feathered Many*

"I CAN forgive him many things for the love he still bears his mother!"

How often we have felt this! When we see a young man fall time after time, when we see him weak and despicable in a hundred ways, yet through all retaining a constant chivalry and devotion toward his mother, do we not feel that, despite his every weakness, there is still something good and worthy in him? Are we not ready to give him still another chance, resting our faith in the one noble ideal he has never rejected?

And this faith is well founded. For every Catholic, at least, motherhood has been eternally glorified. It has become a most noble human ideal and a most lofty human trust. The man who still venerates this ideal and honors the woman who ennobles this trust, has within him, somewhere, a seed of goodness and nobility. He has something which divine grace can nourish and foster into strength. Once more it may be given to the woman to crush the serpent!

But what of the women who hold this trust and are false to it? What of the women who have the God-given power to lead their sons and husbands triumphantly through the struggle, and instead betray them? It would be a great injustice, I think, to say that all such traitors are found among the "rich." Rich and poor are deceptive terms, after all. In this very gross age we are apt to make a standard of living, estimate the income necessary to attain this standard, and draw the line between rich and poor accordingly. A few years ago the possession of an automobile marked a man as "rich." To-morrow there will be some new criterion. What we ignore is this; the poorest man may be rich at heart. He may have made the attainment of riches his one ideal. It matters very little whether he actually becomes rich or not. His mind is set on it, and that alone makes him comparable to the famous camel. If you said that traitors to motherhood are to be found only among the rich-minded, you would be very nearly right. If you included among the rich-minded those to whom power is even more than riches, you would be entirely right.

The rich society women, the feathered few who luxuriate in the cushions of trim limousines, are not all traitors, and those who are can not be called the only traitors. If we count those who wear feathers in their hearts and luxuriate in the limousines of ambition, I am afraid we must speak rather of the feathered many. It is among the feathered many that we must look for the traitors to love and motherhood. And only when we have learned to find them is our task fairly begun.

There is little need for our Catholic women to be disturbed because they find too few chances for "social service" work. The usual forms of "social service" work are the quintessence of snobbery. They are undertaken in a spirit of self-conscious virtue; and this smugness destroys at once what little value the work might otherwise have. As one of our Catholic writers has so well maintained, the religious orders are the great social servers of to-day, as always. Their work is undertaken in humility and in a spirit of true Christian brotherhood. Their charity and their work of education can be accepted gratefully and cheerfully by all. But for those who have chosen motherhood instead of voluntary poverty there is a different kind of social service. It requires no organization; its performance demands no self-advertisement, no snobbery, no futile attempts to adapt oneself to unfamiliar views and conditions of life. The religious orders have learned by centuries of experience that to help the poor you must be poor yourself. That is the one road to the poor man's heart. The charity of the religious orders is the one great charity that never lowers the self-respect of the recipient. In the same way, it remains for Catholic women to learn that to help the mothers of the race best they must be mothers themselves.

The Church is so much a spiritual mother that she can influence her own children; but it is the Catholic mothers of every age and every position in life who must help those outside the Church, those who have less to guide them and who most often turn traitor. If you are a Catholic mother it makes no difference in what circumstances you find yourself, whether you count your income in hundreds or in thousands, whether you are called rich or poor, whether you have inherited social influence or not, you can easily find, if you will only look, some of the feathered many who need your utmost help. Inordinate ambition, either for wealth or power, or both, has corroded their natures and killed their love. It is your task to bring that old love to life, to awaken a new ambition, a holier and nobler ambition, so strong as to sweep away all the corrosion and all the dross. It is your task to make them once more mothers instead of friends.

This must be your social service. But do not think it is easy, simply because it is the work God and nature have assigned you. You are trying to restore painfully, piece by piece, the most fragile and precious, if also the most primitive, ideal of womanhood. Remember, it is a love for the mysterious and the unknown you are trying to reawaken. You can not do this by harshness and by scolding. Just as you can not purchase love, you can not drive or force it. You can not bring to her senses by harshness a woman who thinks her crime is justified. You must make her love those little "unknowns," those faint, quivering voices pleading for a chance to live and themselves know love. You must make her feel the thrill of those little hands clasped frantically about her heart, begging for the warmth of a love that has grown cold. Tenderly and patiently you must nourish to strength that wonderful human love so close to the divine.

This is your task, a task so great that you will need for its accomplishment all the strength of your own mother's love and all the grace of Him whose mother all generations have called blessed. Yet it is a task that has no set time or place. Your chance to fulfil it may come at any and all times. It may come in garish daylight or by the soft glow of an evening fire. It may come upon you as grossly as the ambitions of the feathered many, or as wondrously as in a moment of helpless repentance. When it does come, you can only pray for strength, and set steadfastly before you the noble ideal cherished by that man "to whom we can forgive many things for the love he bears his mother!"

The Church and Salvation

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If, as you so often assert, the Catholic Church is the one true Church, where alone Christ, the Son of God, can be found and had, I think it would interest your readers to know just what hope of salvation there is for those that believe differently.

According to the "World Almanac," there are in this world, 394,000,000 Catholics and 1,209,000,000 Protestants, Jews, Mohammedans and other non-Christians. Therefore, less than one-third of the inhabitants of this globe are to see the glories of heaven. Is that the proper reasoning? An answer in your interesting journal would be appreciated by myself and others too, I am sure.

Richmond Hill, L. I. LOUIS ZIMMERMAN.

THE question raised by this correspondent, though by no means new, is doubtless of interest to many who are concerned for their own spiritual welfare and are desirous of knowing just what the Catholic Church teaches. It was this class of thinkers and inquirers that the editors of the Catholic Encyclopedia had in view when they were selecting and preparing the numerous articles on the Church, which are found in that work. In fact, the very difficulty which the correspondent presents is met in the lucid explanation of Catholic doctrine given by Rev. G. H. Joyce S.J., under the subdivision "The Necessary Means of Salvation" in his article entitled "The Church" (Vol. III, p. 752). For a thorough understanding of the Catholic doctrine, one should first have a correct idea of the purpose for which Christ established the Church and of His design for the salvation of men through the means which He provided. While a full exposition of this matter is not possible here, the following considerations may serve to show at least that Catholic teaching is far from the narrow exclusiveness with which it is too frequently charged.

The Church does not teach that only Catholics can be saved, any more than she teaches that only Catholics can lead virtuous lives. She does not teach that all non-Catholics will be lost nor does she hold that all Catholics will be saved. Salvation is wrought by man's cooperation with Divine grace, not by faith alone nor yet by deeds that are naturally good but are performed without any reference to God.

> The Catholic Church has ever taught that nothing else is needed to obtain justification than an act of perfect charity [love of God] and of contrition [genuine sorrow for sin as an offence against God]. Whoever, under the impulse of actual grace, elicits these acts, receives immediately the gift of sanctifying grace, and is numbered among the children of God. Should he die in these dispositions, he will assuredly attain heaven (Joyce).

A person outside the Church who knows that God has commanded all to join the Church, yet wilfully remains outside, can not sincerely and honestly say that he loves God with his whole heart: love is not compatible with disobedience. Christ did not say that every man should draw up his own plan of salvation or choose any set of beliefs that might be to his liking. He did not establish churches and tell men to select. He did establish a Church, and He did say, "If he will not hear the Church let him be to thee as the heathen and publican." Those who are ignorant of God's command to join the Church or who, in spite of earnest seeking, are unable to discern the Church of Christ, can nevertheless be saved, provided they die in the dispositions of sincere love and sorrow as above mentioned. This is doubtless the case with many who never heard of the Catholic Church or have been reared in heresy. They will not be condemned simply for their failure to become members of the Church in visible communion.

The ordinary means of grace, and therefore of salvation, are the Sacraments instituted by Christ. These are constantly needed for the overcoming of evil inclinations, for resisting temptation and for purifying the soul of sin. Now the Sacraments were entrusted by Christ to the Church, and they are accessible in their fulness only to the members of the Church. Without these supernatural helps, it is extremely difficult to obey Christ's precepts. Hence those who, even through no fault of theirs, remain outside the Church, are deprived of the graces they need to supply for the weakness of human nature. Generally speaking, they are more exposed to the danger of sin and less abundantly provided with the means of obtaining forgiveness than those who are in the Church. Catholics, taught by experience that they must work out their salvation in fear and trembling, can have no feeling but that of pity for those who are struggling on with little or none of the spiritual assistance which membership in the Church secures.

The Church, in striving for the unity in one body of all who believe in Christ, is simply trying to realize the Apostle's ideal of "one Lord, one faith, one baptism." She looks with sorrow upon the divisions that have led so many farther and farther not only from her fold but from any profession whatever of Christianity. At the same time, she would be disloyal to her mission if she taught men that it was not necessary for them to join her communion. It would be a false and misleading leniency to say that one can be saved as well outside the Church as inside. And while she can not compel men to unite with her, it is none the less her duty to tell them plainly what Christ requires. His will as regards the unity of His followers is expressed in the prayer which He offered on the eve of His death: "that they all may be one as thou, Father, in me and I in thee; that they also may be one in us; that the world may believe that thou hast sent me." The unity of the Church is an evidence not only that Christ is her founder, but also that Christ Himself had His mission from the Father. It is the means prayed for by Him to keep His divine origin and work before the eyes of mankind. It must for this reason be a unity that all men can see. In a word, it must be a visible organization with a visible worship and a visible communion. Whoever, then, desires to conform to the expressed will of Christ must become a part of Christ's body, which is the Church, and thus help in his own measure to bring about the unity for which Christ prayed.

What God may be pleased to do in an extraordinary manner for individual souls is known only to Himself. The question here concerns His ordinary dealings, the economy of salvation as revealed and established by Christ the Saviour. For the millions likewise who sit in darkness and the shadow of death, we may and do hope that God will provide, since Christ died for all men. But this hope does not cause the Church to relax her efforts in spreading the Gospel. Her greater concern is for those who have ample opportunity to know the truth and still hold aloof from her communion. Greatest of all is her sorrow for "those who were once illuminated, have tasted also the heavenly gift, and were made partakers of the Holy Ghost, have moreover tasted the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come—and have fallen away."

The Danger of the "Foundations"

The Hon. John Mitchell, of the Workmen's Compensation Commission, when asked to give AMERICA his opinion of the article, "Industrial Commission's Hearings," contributed to the last issue by Mr. Thomas F. Woodlock, made the following comments:

REFERRING to the article in AMERICA, entitled "Industrial Commission's Hearings," by Thomas F. Woodlock, I should say, with respect to the subject of Foundations, that I regard it as absolutely necessary that the functions of these Foundations should be defined in the charters under which they are created, and that the Foundations should not be permitted to exercise other functions. Blanket charters, giving Foundations the right to engage in any kind of business, with no limitation, are, in my judgment, unsound and have elements of danger which the public should be protected against. I believe that these Foundations should be chartered by the Federal Government, not by State governments, and that, in addition to limiting the functions of the Foundations within the purpose described in their charters, the Federal Government itself should be adequately represented on their Boards of Trustees.

With respect to the closing paragraph of the article by Mr. Woodlock, in which he says, "It is not now, nor is it likely to be in the future, against the law to break strikes, in so far as money can break them," I do not understand that it is seriously contended by any one that breaking strikes, per se, is unlawful; however, the methods employed by many corporations to break strikes are unlawful. To employ armed guards to assault and intimidate workingmen who are on strikes is, and should be, unlawful, and should not be tolerated. Strikes are not illegal, nor are they contrary to public policy; indeed, a strike may be, and often is, the highest expression of a divine discontent. Picketing is not unlawful. The courts have repeatedly and almost uniformly held that it is lawful peaceably to persuade a workingman from his intention to take the position formerly held by a striking workman.

It seems to me that all men who are interested in the public welfare should unite in an effort to remove the causes of strikes and industrial turmoil. This result can only be achieved by securing a more equitable distribution of wealth and the establishment of industrial righteousness; and this, I understand to be the purpose of the investigations now being made by the United States Commission on Industrial Relations.

February 25, 1915. JOHN MITCHELL.

Cardinal Mercier

AS the powerful personality of Cardinal Mercier must appeal to the energetic and warm-hearted people of the United States, the following sketch of His Eminence's character will doubtless be of interest to AMERICA's readers. The Cardinal has a keen sense of humor and is noted for the readiness of his repartee. He has a special gift for silencing his opponents without wounding their feelings, and they even relish the wit that leaves them without a word to answer. This rare gift seems to have won the admiration even of the socialists, for they have declared him to be "quite the right sort," and no longer attack him.

Cardinal Mercier's private life is one of real evangelical poverty. His table is plain and simple, as many a chance guest has experienced; yet, when he entertains he does so handsomely. For instance, about two years' ago the convent of the "Minimes" of Louvain presented His Eminence with a rochet made of the new "Orient" lace invented by one of the nuns, and which received the gold medal at the Ghent Exhibition of 1913. Thereupon he invited to his palace all the working girls who had had a hand in making the rochet, sending them a generous banknote for their railway expenses. After saying Mass for them in his private chapel, he conducted the girls to one of the salons where a tempting breakfast awaited them. He then appeared clad in his Cardinal's robes, which he put on just to give the lace-makers the pleasure of seeing the effect of their work when worn over the scarlet silk. Afterward he produced some of his photographs and, asking the name of each girl in turn, he wrote on the picture his autograph with a special blessing for her and her family.

Cardinal Mercier spends very little on himself that he may have more to give to the needy. Last year the cost of gas having risen, he had electric lights placed in his house. While stringing the wires, the electrician had to pass through the Cardinal's bedroom, and, yielding to curiosity, examined it very carefully. The description he gave of its poverty caused a sensation in Mechlin, for the chamber was a small, plain, white-washed room with bare, unpolished floor, and furnished with a springless bedstead, a pallet of straw for a mattress, two chairs, a washstand and a clothes-press, all of the cheapest kind. The electrician declared that in all Belgium the humblest servant in a decent family would scarcely be given so poor a room.

Some years ago the Cardinal was presented with a motor car which he gladly accepted for it enabled him to call without ceremony, and at any moment of leisure, on any of the priests of his vast diocese. Though his clergy number 2,500 he makes it a point to keep in touch with every one of them and to know all their needs and difficulties. Moreover the seeming luxury of a motor car proved a great saving to its owner. A cardinal ranks in Europe with a prince of the blood royal and consequently he is bound by certain forms of etiquette which are very costly. Each time he travels by rail, for instance, he must give liberal tips to every employee of the stations at which he begins and ends the journey. Needless to say, on such occasions, employees spring up like mushrooms. Besides this, he must take the entire railway carriage he travels in and must pay for all the compartments it contains. Thus the possession of a motor, bitterly criticized at first by the socialists, saves His Eminence's charities several thousand dollars a year.

This automobile bears witness, moreover, to the Cardinal's extraordinary capacity for work. No sooner was the car received than His Eminence had it fitted up inside with a folding-desk at which, while driving from one village to another, he attends to much of his correspondence. The automobile is in a dilapidated condition now, and for the last two years his chauffeur has been constantly begging him to get a new one, but in vain, for the only answer is: "Come now, Franz, think of my poor. Our old motor has not wholly collapsed yet." Etiquette forbids his visiting any laymen except those of high rank, but in his eyes the poor are all of the blood royal and he visits them in their humble homes and tenements, bringing with him words of comfort and substantial relief. It is chiefly on their account that he is now in such distress because of the ruin of so many convents. As all who know Belgium intimately are aware, the working classes owe a great deal to the convents. Not only do the nuns train the women of Belgium to become the splendid housewives they are but, besides this, the convents are important industrial centers, giving well-paid employment in lace-making, embroidery, lingerie, glove and corset-making and other trades to thousands of women and girls.

Cardinal Mercier's earnest desire is that all his priests shall lead the life of evangelical poverty and renunciation which he lives himself, and great numbers of them do so. His zeal on this head is amply proved by two excellent books, his "Conferences," and his "Retreat to Priests." He always spends his summer vacation preaching the annual retreat to his priests, who gather for the purpose at Mechlin in groups of some 350 at a time. This means giving three lectures every day, except Saturdays and Sundays, for six consecutive weeks. When he found in the beautiful life of Father Chevrier, of Lyons, his ideal of the true Catholic priest, he was so desirous that all his clergy should read the book and conform their own lives to it, that out of his own meager purse he bought over 2,500 copies of the volume and presented one to each priest and seminarian of his very extensive diocese.

Cardinal Mercier has in addition to his other gifts a remarkably clear head for business and for all kinds of administration. He is constantly being consulted on such matters by high and low. Consequently on private audience days there is no fixed hour for his dinner. He continues receiving until all are heard. Hand in hand with his practical turn of mind goes an essentially different quality: a keen sense of the beautiful, especially in art and in poetry. Though now aged sixty-four, His Eminence's imagination seems to have lost none of its brilliancy. For instance, about thirteen months ago, an Irish woman residing in the Mechlin diocese sent him a copy of "The Hound of Heaven." Though English is one of the eight languages that Cardinal Mercier has mastered, yet the giver of the poem scarcely expected him to appreciate it fully. She was agreeably surprised, however, to find that he had sat up nearly a whole night making a literal translation of the poem into French to make sure that he thoroughly understood the beauty of the verses.

Cardinal Mercier's love for his flock is so strong that he would gladly shed his last drop of blood for them. On his return from Rome last autumn he found that his priests, in order to escape observation, had thought it prudent to let their beards grow and to adopt the secular dress. He at once expressed his desire that they should resume their clerical garb so that in case of need every sheep of the flock should be able to distinguish them as priests. It was his wish that no word of comfort or encouragement should remain unspoken merely to save the life of a priest. "If we have to die for our people, why, let us die for them." Is it surprising then that the Belgians love their Cardinal?

A "White List" of Plays

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Catholic Theater Movement submits the following list of plays as a suggested guide. Though the plays mentioned are free from any gross feature, yet it must be admitted that the tone of some of them could be more elevated. Indeed, it is felt that "there will be Catholic play-goers who, consistently with their own standards, may properly refuse to accept every play on the list":

Life of St. Catherine of Genoa

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have had for many years in my library a "Life of St. Catherine of Genoa," together with her "Spiritual Dialogues" and "Treatise on Purgatory." In the Introduction, written by the late Father Hecker, in the year 1873, it is stated the translation was "Made by one who is now no more, but who while living was like our Saint: distinguished for her intellectual gifts, for charity toward the poor and abandoned, and in consecrating her pen to the cause and glory of God's Church." Can you tell me the name and something about the translator?

The Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Could anything, even a persecution, demonstrate more plainly than did the Mexican muddle, the helplessness of the American Catholics from the standpoint of powerful organization and an influential press? After the tempest has raged with truly diabolical fury against the Church in the unhappy republic, we protest to President Wilson and fulminate against "the conspiracy of silence" on the part of the ruling press agencies and the majority of our dailies. Some of our people will get a little education out of our tardy awakening, but the enemies of the Church, who are slowly and systematically preparing the way for their Villas, Carranzas, and other persecutors in this country, laugh in their sleeves at our monumental impotence. As you observed in your excellent editorial of some months ago on our lack of influence, almost our only consolation with reference to organized power and public recognition seems to be the fact that our number is 16,000,000.

No wonder one of our bishops is quoted as intimating that the Mexican situation proves us to be as sheepish as chattel slaves. Had we a powerful daily press, we would soon boast a strong and conservatively progressive body of wide-awake and fearless Catholics, who would jealously guard the interests of Catholic Christianity, elementary justice, and Christian morality, instead of being afraid to stand up in Congress for persecuted priests and violated nuns in the name of humanity, common decency and the Constitution.

Our press miserere will never be materially changed until the majority of our leaders agree on the need of an influential Catholic daily press in the English language, and act by training their people accordingly. I wish Dr. Flick success in his attempt to raise that $2,000,000 endowment for a Catholic daily. Nor do I contend that we have not a sufficient number of able journalists, cartoonists, managers, etc., to get out a half a dozen or more dailies. But a clean and thoroughly Catholic daily press needs a large reading public. This we will not have for the class of dailies we need, until larger circles of our people have been taught to consider the ruling sensation-mongering daily press an evil. Priests and laymen who have occasion to visit many Catholic homes in our cities will tell you that very seldom do they find a family where the father and mother, compelled for business or other reasons to keep the local daily, do not permit it to scandalize their children. A. BECK.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A great deal has been said pro and con concerning a Catholic daily. Many ideas have been presented, but so far none seem to have merited serious consideration. What about the following plan: We will presume a diocesan daily is to be founded in a diocese of 100,000 Catholics. Issue stock at $10 per share. It is fair to assume that of the 100,000 Catholics, 20,000 would be able and willing to buy shares. The majority, of course, would buy one share; others would buy two, three, four, five, ten, twenty, fifty to one hundred or more shares. Individual investments would range from $10 to, say, $1,000. We will presume that $40 would be the average investment. This would net $800,000. With this one could either buy an existing paper or found a new one. Every stockholder could, of course, be relied upon to subscribe for the paper, thus insuring at least 20,000 subscribers to start with. A good amount of advertising at a fair rate could be secured for a daily of such circulation. It should be an evening paper and not called "Catholic." Were an able journalist secured to conduct the editorial department in the proper manner, and a capable business manager to oversee the advertising, circulation and accounting departments, it seems full success would be assured.

Toledo, Ohio. N. N.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The need of a Catholic daily press is obvious. To whom should we look for its establishment? Certainly not to the rank and file in the Church. Their poverty makes them helpless. How can our wealthy Catholics be so apathetic on a matter that is of such vital importance to the Faith? They have it in their power to prevent thousands from falling away. Why do they do nothing?

Philadelphia. JOHN P. TONEY.

Questions of Catholic Interest

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"A Perfect Fool" says in a recent issue that "there are questions of Catholic interest in this country that cry aloud for a hearing, but they are never mentioned." I ask him to state explicitly some of such questions in your columns.

"A Ludicrous Anachronism"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"The men who are striving to raise the religious issue to-day are taking for granted in the American people a mental attitude that is happily passing away." Would that we could think as the writer of "A Ludicrous Anachronism" (AMERICA, Feb. 20,) that the mental attitude of the past is sinking into an unhallowed grave. On all sides we see the very opposite of this statement. The spirit of intolerant bigotry is as rife in our land to-day as ever in the history of the past. Although not resolving itself into clubs and brickbats, the effects of its propaganda are more malicious. No man with half an eye for observation can consider the spirit of this age, its so-called "literature," its dramas, its suggestive films, its disregard for everything Catholic and Christian, and still believe that the spirit of prejudice has passed. If the mental attitude of a vast section of the American people has changed, why is it that filthy papers are not only spread broadcast over the country, but given a hearty welcome by thousands of our "well-wishers"? Why is it that priests of God and consecrated women devoted to the service of their fellow man are openly insulted in the streets? Why do our postal authorities have to be pushed to the performance of their clear-cut duties as prescribed by law? If the knell of bigotry's funeral were tolling would hundreds of thousands of Americans crowd one another from the box offices of theaters where the sacred character of Sisters is made a wretched plaything? Would these same Americans, with their minds and hearts full of the evil which their eager eyes have just drunk in, yet cry for more of the filthy stuff? We think not. If a clean and broad-minded spirit were growing up in American manhood and womanhood at large, the purveyors of vice would soon find the misrepresentations of the most sacred and the dearest of Catholic practices a very poor stock in trade.

The entire article is too optimistic. I do not deny that scepticism is the fad of the hour, but I do deny that scepticism is any indication of "broadened mentality" as the writer implies. A moment's reflection wil make clear that scepticism in practice leads only to selfishness, and selfishness is the very essence of narrow-mindedness, the dominant evil of our day. This "broadened mentality" is the watchword of the Church's enemies. What does it mean? What are its results? The present worldwide anti-Catholic campaign is the answer, and broad-minded Americans are by no means trailing in the rear.

New York. L. RONALD.

A Course in Reading

To the Editor of AMERICA:

James J. Walsh, M.D., writes in AMERICA, issue of Feb. 13, as follows:

> The men who really amount to something in life have not read many books, but have read a few great books over and over again. . . . Many of the men we think most of in this country . . . had in their homes not more than a dozen or at most, a score of books, and they attributed their habits of thought and their power of expression and their ability to concentrate their attention to the practice of reading these over and over again.

Very well, but why not make this explanation a practical one, by mentioning the books Dr. Walsh has in mind? Dr. Walsh certainly knows that the majority of our young Catholics, not having the means nor the time to attend a university, can not get a "liberal" education. Is it not natural that they look for a series or collection of text-books, in order to extend their education? Which classics should be read? Which editions carry sound comments and critical notes? As Dr. Walsh made the above statement, we would regard it as a great favor if he would give us some practical and definite advice on this matter.

An Open Letter to the Editor of "Life"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Why does the otherwise mildly intelligent Mr. Metcalfe insist, from time to time, upon marring the average respectability of his dramatic criticisms by saying stupid things? Stupid things are unpardonable! Even fairly informed Protestants (Germans or Allies at your choice), to say nothing of Anglicans, let alone Catholics, probably yawned prodigiously when they met the venerable old family ghost:

> Soldier and nun are both survivals of the Dark Ages, which, in spite of the present-day resort to brute force, are very slowly but none the less surely bound to give way to the spread of human enlightenment. (Criticism of the Belasco-Knoblauch play "Marie-Odile," page 240, issue of February 11, 1915.)

If they didn't yawn, perhaps they asked some gentle nun to remember Mr. Metcalfe in her prayers, for the intention that he too might receive his share of "human enlightenment." Or, if they didn't yawn, or ask some patient Sister to pray for him, they probably were vexed at Mr. Metcalfe's temerity in attempting to improve on the diction of Martin Luther and those other heretics before Martin who, mayhap, expressed themselves more elegantly than did Martin himself. Or, if they neither yawned, nor bespoke orisons, nor were vexed, they were very angry, possibly, which was least happy of all, because busy people can not afford to waste time destroying such a weather-damaged and unlovely old straw-man as this. The average human being likes to be controverted cleverly and on something really difficult and comparatively original. He hates stupid things. And Mr. Metcalfe has said something very stupid. Please let him not do it again.

Washington, D. C. THOMAS QUINN BEESLEY.

The Time of Death

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A useful and consoling booklet has lately been published with the title "A Little Book of Comfort in Time of War." It is a publication of the English Catholic Truth Society, and its author is Mr. Edward Ingram Watkin. His was a happy thought. His little volume will bring consolation to large multitudes of sorrowing hearts; and, what is better still, raise their thoughts heavenward and sanctify them by bringing about a gentle submission to the Divine will.

There is, however, one passage in the little work of which we can not approve, because it is not true doctrine. Yet it is laid down as the infallible teaching of the Church. We quote the writer's own words. He says:

> As Catholics we possess absolute certainty that every death on a blood-drenched field of battle was ordained from all eternity, as the best provision for each man who there lost his life. God, foreknowing all that each would be and do, decreed that the thread of his individual life should be so interwoven with the web of public history as to break off at that particular point of time, for so it would be best for that soldier's immortal soul. Even if the man in question should alas! be lost eternally, even so would this remain true, for had he lived longer, he would have added to his sin, and therefore to the intensity of his punishment (pages 33, 34).

We have italicized the objectionable statements.

First, we ask where does the Church teach that doctrine, so as to give us absolute certainty regarding it? We suppose the author had in mind the consoling words of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans (viii, 28): "We know that to them that love God, all things work together unto good." But this is not said of those who do not love God, who are in mortal sin.

In fact Christ tells us distinctly that "It were better for him (Judas) if that man had not been born" (Matt. xxvi, 24). Of course it would likewise have been better for Judas if he had died in his infancy. It would have been better for any one who dies in sin, whether on the battlefield or elsewhere, if he had died while he was in the state of grace, or if he had lived long enough to repent of his sins and lived to prepare worthily for a holy death. It is certainly not revealed that no one who is lost would not have been saved by God's grace if he had lived longer; nor is there any argument from reason to make such a statement probable. Rather the contrary is the case.

Chicago. CHARLES COPPENS, S.J.

Successful Examinations in England

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In one of your recent numbers we read of the success of the Catholic schools of Ireland in the public examinations. The record was a glorious one. I am sure that Catholics in America will be no less glad to hear of the triumphs of the Catholic colleges and convents of England. The year 1914 is surely a record one. There were nearly twenty thousand young girls and boys entered for the Oxford Senior, Junior and Preliminary Divisions. In the Senior the first two places were won by the students of the Jesuit College of Wimbledon, and out of seventy-six first class honors seven fell to Catholic schools. In the Junior Division the first four places were taken by Catholics. Wimbledon College again capturing the much-coveted first and second places. In the Preliminary Division Wimbledon again continued its triumphant course, two of its pupils tieing for first place, while another of its pupils is placed fourth. What is still more creditable to the Catholic schools of Great Britain is that the only two Exhibitions offered were taken by Catholic pupils, Wimbledon being again the lucky college to secure them. The high places secured by many of the convent girls manifest the high grade of study aimed at and attained by the convents of Great Britain. The percentages of those who passed in Honors are greatly in favor of Catholics. This magnificent record of Catholic pupils in Great Britain ought to serve as food for thought to those among us who are ever complaining of Catholic schools and asserting that the education given in Catholic schools is inferior to that given elsewhere.

Chinese Metaphysics

ONE of the first lessons the student of logic learns is the relation between cause and effect, and, incidentally, he gets to know something of the Law of Sufficient Reason: at least he did so until the logic of the newspaper correspondent burst upon an expectant world, and enunciated the happy doctrine of effect from any or no cause, or the Law of Insufficient Reason. And for this evangel the Boston correspondent of the Springfield Republican has been elected a chosen vessel.

At Governor Walsh's reception on Washington's birthday, the Republican correspondent saw two singular incidents which could be said to indicate the presence of war in Europe. One was a company of some two or three hundred boys of the St. Vincent Brigade, in white military uniforms. The other was the organization known as the St. Mary's Cardinal Cadets, also in regimentals, but red. The connection is, of course, obvious. The boys were Catholics: there are Catholics in Europe. They were in uniform: there are Catholics in uniform in Europe. By a process of Chinese metaphysics the conclusion is drawn from the premises, and the Law of Insufficient Reason is established. This is an outward and visible sign of the inward and intellectual vacuum induced by the newer logic.

The presence of the boys—young Catholics in arms!—"seemed to indicate that here was a large number of boys from ten to fifteen years of age who are receiving regular military training and being accustomed to the manual of arms. In these days, when there is so much sensitiveness upon race and religious matters, such a display of military training in such a quarter could not but be noticeable." The greatest loss our Protestant brethren sustained, after they lost the Faith, was the loss of the sense of humor; for there can be conceived nothing more grotesquely solemn than to see in a few Catholic boy cadets a vision of free America being handed over, body and soul, to the power of the Pope by force of arms: and Mr. G. K. Chesterton says that solemnity is the special mark and seal of Satan! The faculty of "seeing things," hitherto confined more or less to seers, clairvoyants and lunatics, would appear to be in process of extending itself to the journalistic profession, while a convenient close reason for the rule of non-sequitur leaves the ground clear for many a hearty run from insufficient causes to lurid effects.

When the soldiers of Washington's army, near Boston, in 1775, prepared to celebrate "Pope Day," the General issued an order that, "having been apprised of a design formed for the observance of that ridiculous and childish custom . . . he can not help expressing his surprise that there should be officers and soldiers in his army so void of common sense as not to see the impropriety of such a step."

And it has been left to the Republican's correspondent to make use of the celebration of General Washington's birthday to see in the spectacle of young lads being trained in manliness, reverence for authority, and patriotism, merely a vehicle for a covert sneer of disloyalty flung at the descendants of those same American Catholics to whom he said: "I presume that your fellow-citizens will not forget the patriotic part which you took in the accomplishment of their Revolution, and the establishment of your Government."

"Observers," continues the Republican, "would be sure to ask the question, why this class of boys, rather than all other kinds of boys, are being given military instruction." Unless the New England sense of observation is sui generis, observers will know perfectly well that military instruction is given at countless schools throughout the country, irrespective of religious denomination; and are more likely to ask the question, why this class of observer, rather than all other kinds of observers, is being given the post of newspaper correspondent.

The Cult of the Comfortable

IT is the rather inglorious distinction of the American people to have invented the cult of the comfortable. Side by side with strength and vigor of purpose, we have developed a craving for such refinements of luxury as minister to bodily ease in a degree unparalleled by anything in Europe. England indeed knows the word, but it is not given over to the quest; France, with all its frivolity and love of pleasure, has not even the word. "Comfortable" had to be imported into its vocabulary, and to-day, though the Academicians use it, quotation marks still show that it is an alien and not a native product. With us, however, the desire to be comfortable is almost universal; it has pervaded all classes; it has taken from us much of the old energy of our national life.

The Lenten season is a protest against this quest for the restful and easy and pleasant things of life. The purpose of its gospels is to rouse us from our lethargy and from our weak yielding to self. Life upon earth is a warfare, and the Christian who would not be false to ideals must be strong and militant in self-denial. Our struggle is with the powers of darkness. Now Christ long ago pointed out the folly of trying to cast out devils by Beelzebub. Allies do not fight among themselves. We can not do what the Son of God did not even try to do. We can not cast out sin by yielding to one of the capital sins. There is no easy road to "the Celestial Jerusalem." "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent bear it away." The violence of which there is question in these words of Our Lord is principally violence against oneself, a thing with which the cult of the comfortable is utterly at variance. Out of our hearts we have to cast the devil, and this can never be done by softness. Sloth is no defence whatever. It is not even the armor wherein the most foolish of men might trust. Discipline of soul and body is called for by the Church, contrition also and penance, and this not merely to atone and satisfy for personal sin, but to bring both mind and body into subjection, and to fill them with force and resolution to fight, not for pleasurable idleness and enervating ease but for the better, the nobler, the more worthy things of life, the things that endure beyond the passing of time.

The Champagne Bottle and Billy Sunday

THE postal authorities are at last aroused. The country is saved.

A few weeks ago, an individual in Philadelphia, mailed a bottle of champagne to a friend in New York, bidding him "drown his sorrows" by imbibing thereof. But a lynx-eyed kill-joy, in the guise of a Postal Inspector, intervened, and the charitable person from the City of Brotherly Love was compelled to pledge himself in the sum of five hundred dollars, to appear before a jury of his peers, and explain this heinous violation of the postal laws.

The second instance of the extraordinary alertness now pertaining to our postal officials comes from St. Louis, the home of a paper devoted primarily, it would seem, to the promotion of blasphemy. In an evil hour the editor published a cartoon of Billy Sunday, "intended to mean and signify," reads the indictment, "that the said William A. Sunday, commonly called Billy Sunday, was not, and is not, a sincere and conscientious preacher." Indictment? Alas, one must speak of indictment. For one Wilberforce Jones, of Cushing, Oklahoma, was forthwith moved to lodge a complaint, one complaint, be it noted, with the postal authorities. Immediately the mighty engine of the law began to creak, whir, roar. Things happened. The editor, and eke the publisher, were haled before the United States Commissioner. Furnishing bail in a suitable amount, they now breathe the free air of the Missouri metropolis. But they, too, await trial for violation of the postal laws; specifically for sending a cartoon of Billy Sunday through the mails.

Great is Wilberforce Jones, of Cushing, Oklahoma. Upon what meat has he fed that he is become so terrible to our quondam supine postal authorities? The meaning and intent of the Billy Sunday cartoon sounds like the panegyric of a saint, when compared to the catalogues of crime attributed to the "Bishop of Rome," and other officers of the Catholic Church, and obligingly spread throughout the country by the postal authorities. Mr. Jones, it seems, made but one complaint. Action followed. At a moderate estimate Catholics have made about a quarter of a million. But the postal authorities only smiled, and smiled, and smiled, and continued to issue receipts for postage paid on these catalogues of crime. Why the difference? We pause for a lengthy and muddled reply from the Solicitor-General of the Post-Office Department.

His Name is Hogan

A GENTLEMAN who rejoices in the classic patronymic of Hogan has received the Victoria Cross. According to reports, he is as modest as he is brave, and of his bravery there can be little question. By a newspaper headline he is accredited with the efficiency of an army, or at least a regiment. While there may be a touch of epic color in this account, Sergeant Hogan's superior officers considered that this Irishman's valiant feats were worthy of striking recognition, and he was recommended, despite his name, for the Victoria Cross. Now he has a decoration, the highest military distinction that England can confer, and his name is still Hogan, plain, everyday Hogan. It is not at all likely that he is connected with the family in Boston who found this horribly vulgar name of Hogan, a veritable lion, blocking the path along which lay the pursuit of life's higher ideals. If he considers the matter at all, and being a man and a very gallant gentleman, he very probably does not, Sergeant Hogan, V. C., is doubtless content to take his rank with Napoleon, as the founder of his own dynasty.

Dr. Carroll's Statistics

THE Reverend Doctor H. K. Carroll is again before the public with a new and thrilling show of religious statistics. Dr. Carroll is the Hagenbeck of figures. He can make them lie down, roll over, or sit up and bark, at the word of command. As a rule, a respectable society, secular or religious, is accorded the right of specifying the conditions upon which it grants membership, and of certifying the number of its members. Its reports are not rejected on the ground that its members have not qualified for admission into quite another society. Thus, one does not question the statistics issued by the Knights of Pythias, by objecting that very few of the Knights are Companions of the Bath. But Dr. Carroll may; for he considers that it is he, and not the Catholic Church, who has the sole right to define what constitutes membership in the Catholic Church.

Dr. Carroll's methods are peculiar. Compiling, in 1915, the statistics for 1914, he takes the membership of the Catholic Church for 1913. Then he deducts fifteen per cent., for, says our learned Doctor, baptized children, who have not received the sacrament of Confirmation, are not members of the Catholic Church. The fact that for nineteen centuries the Catholic Church has held that Baptism, and not Confirmation, makes one a member of her fold, and that in consequence a baptized baby is as truly a Catholic as Benedict XV makes no impression whatever upon the impervious Dr. Carroll. He knows better. He can allow no exception to his rule, he proclaims, and then proceeds to make his figures roll over by accrediting 3,165 members to the Japanese Church and 100,568 to the Orthodox Friends. It need not be remarked that neither the Japanese nor the Friends administer the sacrament of Confirmation.

Perhaps it might be impolite to point out that, from the viewpoint of Catholic theology, the Methodists lack this sacred rite as completely as the Friends and the Japanese. Were a Catholic statistician to adopt Dr. Carroll's rule, he would report the astonishing fact that there are no Methodists in the whole world.

Pounding a Theatrical Manager

"THERE would be no smut on the American stage to-day," announces a prominent theatrical manager, "if the public did not want it. Don't pound the managers. Pound the public."

The old excuse! "Don't pound me," says the fiend who sells drugs to school-children. "The children want it. Pound the children." "Don't pound me," pleads the politician who buys his office. "The voters want my money. Pound the voter." "Don't pound me," cries every rascal who panders to the lowest in his fellows. "I cater to the wants of many. Pound my patrons."

Does the manager expect to be taken seriously? What trafficker in sin but could make the same excuse?

The Right to Defame

SUPPOSE that a person, himself of dubious reputation, should inform you with every possible sign of merriment, that your mother was always a thing of shame. Should his merriment bring him to the hospital for repairs, you have failed, doubtless, to practise heroic charity. But have you invaded his right of free speech?

Suppose, further, that this vile thing, by lure of an appeal to man's lowest passions, draws a crowd into a public hall, where, for a price, he defames not only your Protestant mother, your wife, your daughter, your sister, but makes the vilest charges against every Protestant woman in the community. Can this mud-born monster, to whom Caliban is an angel of light, claim that the law, which sometimes stops his unclean mouth, has deprived him of his right of free speech?

Change "Protestant" to "Catholic." Then you have a faint picture of the indignities which have been heaped, not only upon our consecrated nuns, who give their lives to the service of God in prayer and the alleviation of every form of human suffering, but upon every Catholic woman who makes use of the Sacrament of Penance.

There is no lack of smug journalists who think it shocking, that Catholics, goaded beyond endurance, recently endeavored to remove an unspeakable "ex-priest" from the community by pelting him with tainted eggs and derelict vegetables. It is shocking. Mobs are always unwise and unlawful, and may easily become criminal. But it is ridiculous to claim that this beastly person has a constitutional right to introduce his Yahoo practices into a decent community. No one has a constitutional right to defame. Of those who listen to him, it need only be said that like loves like.

Once Upon a Time

THERE was a man who had two good friends and they were very true to him. He understood that they were friends of his father too and had promised that they would take particular care of the son. They were not demonstrative or obtrusive friends. In fact, the man was often ashamed of himself that boisterous and boon companions more frequently rang his door-bell and dined with him. Sometimes indeed the man was stricken with twinges of remorse and on making up a theater-party or planning a fishing trip or some other pleasant jaunt, he sent his friends an invitation to be present, but they declined. "Chaps like us," they answered, "would only be in the way."

The man could not remember when Constant and Victor, as his father called them familiarly, entered into his life. As with most thoughtless and unreflecting youngsters, he took favors from all sides and paid but little attention to his benefactors. One day, however, in the September after graduating from the High School, he was wondering what he must do, when whom should he meet but Constant. "What's the matter?" he was asked cheerily, and, on giving his answer, he was persuaded that the place for the High School graduate was college. Victor was not near at the time, but fortunately happened in at the end of the lad's first month at college and safely tided him over a fit of blues. The man, reviewing his college days, could not say to which of the two he should be more grateful. Constant came to visit him more frequently, but Victor came on special occasions and just when needed. When they came together, as not infrequently happened, the man remembered those occasions as red-letter days of his college career. Often he noticed that Victor's visit followed closely upon Constant's, and he suspected that there was an understanding between them. Several occasions stood out prominently, and he recalled them with special gratitude to Victor. There was the finish of the mile-run when he thought he should never head the rival runner. It was just then when all seemed lost, he heard Victor's voice and its thrill lifted the lead from his feet, unwound his dead muscles and hurled him over the line a winner. Again, it was the night of the prize debate. He rose for his rebuttal with a feeling that all was lost. He caught sight of Victor's eyes fixed shining upon him and fought like one inspired and turned defeat into success. Most gratefully of all he remembers the day he was about to give up college, even despite the urging of Constant. He fortunately heard from the other friend, and Victor's eloquent message kept him studying till he received his diploma and degree. "It was Constant," he told everybody, "who brought me to college, but it was Victor who made me graduate."

The man's friends had come to spend a night with him. He had wished to thank them for his success in life and finally he had prevailed upon them to visit him. No others were there. The meeting took place in the library. When he clasped their hands, it was already growing dark. "My good friends," the man said tremulously, "I have not shown you the gratitude you deserve. You have stood by me always. More so when I faced life than when preparing for it. I was beginning to dissipate, when you, Constant, checked me and you, Victor, held me fast. Were it not for your help, I should never have dared to follow what was right in my profession and would not be occupying the high position which I now hold."

Then in rivalry the two friends told the man some of their many exploits. Constant it was who had inspired a Great Leader to fit Himself for His career amid the privations and the solitude of the desert, and Victor came in opportunely to comfort the Leader when the struggle was at its worst. "It was I," said Constant, "who made the Leader enter bravely into His Agony." "It was I," returned Victor, "who made Him, being in His Agony, to pray the more." "Who then are you?" cried the startled man. "Are you not my father's friends?" "My name is Courage," replied Constant. "And mine, Pluck," answered Victor; "And we always see the Face of thy Father Who is in heaven," said both. At that the man looked up dazed and saw no one, but only the moonlight falling upon his Crucifix.

LITERATURE

Poetry and the People

THE members of the theatrical company are peering through convenient holes in the scenery with heart-chills at the empty seats and heart-thrills where they see unbroken ranks of the audience. Only the leading man or the old-timer holds off in disdain or affected indifference, but give them a clear stage, and the glued eye steals a surreptitious glance. The arts want an audience. The poet may appear more indifferent than speaker or actor because the audience is not so immediate or pressing a need, but no poet will be content to soliloquize or issue closet poems for a select clientele. A poet does not wish to be a mere carver of bric-a-brac. He has a message, and he does not sing it to the empty air. If his audience is not now filling up the seats in front of his stage, he hopes that from years and centuries and cycles, he may gradually call enough listeners of his message to gratify at least his prophetic eye.

The poet mourns for his lost inheritance, when he was the bard who issued religious oracles, the minstrel who embodied his country's heroes in stirring verse, or the troubadour who sang of love and home and war. He is ill-content with the bottom of the magazine page when his ancestors were in temple and castle. Not the orator only, but the poet and all artists strive each in his own way to be popular, and the poet ought to feel the pulse of the people, if he would avoid the hieroglyphics of mere symbolism by thinking to himself, or become maudlin and incoherent by talking to himself. Homer talked to his fellow-men and kept his feet on earth and his head out of the clouds. He took the story-songs which the people liked, and in them he delivered his message. The epic after Homer grew conventional and artificial and retired into a closet. Then poetry went out again where the people were and took their songs, which, in course of time, etherealized into subtle lyrics and drifted into the closet. Once more the people were approached and their village masks and rude miracle plays were lifted by art into the drama. Will the drama of to-day succumb to the popular picture plays? Will it stereotype into a fossil and remain in a closet, or will it, as seems more likely, be rejuvenated by touch with the "movies" and display new forms of art. Pastoral poetry followed a like course, from the people to Theocritus, to Virgil, to Italian and French poetical shepherds and shepherdesses, who most likely could not tell a sheep from a goat.

Poetry, then, is not content with the closet; it insists on being abroad and in touch with the people. If its various species become conventional they are discarded for what the people like; if its forms lose their spontaneity by hardening into rigid moulds, the moulds are broken, and fresh forms are sought; if the language is transformed into fossil ornamentation, a Wordsworth will wish to have poetry frankly speak in the language of the people. Browning will rebel against the smoothness of line and ease of rhyme; Patmore will chafe at the shackles of verse which Whitman will utterly break; Kipling, following Thespis and Tyrtaeus and Theocritus, fares forth to life and comes back with new quarrying from the rough cliffs, ready for poetry's enhancing sculpture and polish. Then, again, art and conventionality and decay.

Poetry will be heard, and why should it not? The poet claims to be a seer, and have visions of the truth not vouchsafed to other men. He is on fire with his message. He will not be a mere revealer of nature and luxuriate in the asphodel meadows of sheer description, whose abundance too often means mental barrenness for the readers. He might poetize a star, as a painter paints it, "when only one is shining in the sky," content simply to reveal its beauty in its perfect being, its ontological truth and ontological beauty, we might term it. That will be a poem indeed, but he will see other truths in a star, truths of knowledge, intellectual truths, and he will manifest their perfection and beauty. Beauty is the handmaid of truth; the luster and resplendence of reality. The poet will reveal logical truth, and his audience will again taste the fine flavor of the beauty we mean, and experience the delights of mental appreciation which are the proper and peculiar harvest of beauty. The poet is not yet content. There is more truth still in his star. "The heavens are telling the glory of God" and the poet will with the Psalmist see the law of God in the firmament on high. The poet will have visions of moral truth and will want his listeners to act in accordance with them. He will have recourse to the grandeur of eloquence. Then the good, which is the source of emotion and of all action, will be vested by poetry with appropriate beauty. The poet will reveal the beauty of joy, the beauty of desire, of hope, of love, of good, and thus he will reach with the help of eloquence to the heart of the people.

So have acted all the poets. Professor Murray would have us believe that the legion whose name according to him is Homer, expurgated Greek religion of many of its cruelties to teach a higher morality. David taught in his psalms and Isaiah in his prophecies and Job in his lamentations as well as Horace with his aurea mediocritas. Wearing the mask of apparent beauty and apparent good, come the evil teachers, Shelley with his revolt and atheism and Swinburne with his hedonism. The poets will have an audience, they will teach, not like professors, but rather like prophets. They lay open their truths to our intuition rather than to our reasoning powers. They do not drag us through a syllogism, but entrance us with a vision wherein truth and beauty are united. Eloquence will reach out its hand to poetry when eloquence is aflame with love of good. Then poetry will fascinate the mind with its high beauty and eloquence will capture the heart with its entrancing good, and like a chivalrous and fiery knight with his fair lady, they will attract the eyes of the world. Poetry will have its audience.

REVIEWS

St. Clare of Assisi. By ERNEST GILLIAT-SMITH. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $3.50.

Partly as an inheritance from the romantic age in which he lived, partly as a result of his own paradoxical character, the story of St. Francis of Assisi, of St. Clare and others of his companions, has come down to us intricately interwoven with a tissue of what must be considered purely legendary. One result of this has been that there has arisen, outside the Church, a class of persons, who, having scant regard for saints as such, have nevertheless brought into being an esthetic and sentimental cultus of St. Francis and Franciscanism; a class to whom the beauty of holiness combined with sanctified common sense would make no very great appeal, a class whose leanings were more toward such medieval attitudes and pious antics as they might discern in the lives of those whom they patronize. Although the plain truth is that the saints, medieval or otherwise, were in their day no more romantic or medieval than a Wall Street broker is in his.

Mr. Gilliat-Smith's plan is to set down a critical life of St. Clare, for which purpose he has gathered together all the available evidence of contemporary witnesses and the later medieval writers, from which he presents the life of the saint in an interesting light. He has thought it best, in the interests of truth, to clear the ground somewhat first of all, and with this intent goes carefully into the alleged corruption of the Church at the time of St. Francis' conversion. It will be seen that the fact that there was in existence a remarkable and widespread spiritual and evangelical activity is a complete refutation to the charges of writers such as Sabatier, who would picture the Church as in a state of complete decadence when St. Francis stepped in to save her from extinction. The author sees no reason for believing that St. Clare belonged to the family of the Scefi, and finds sufficient proof in the death of her father, when she was about nine years old, to put out of court the romance that some ten years later he tried by force to prevent her taking the veil: so the story of the midnight flight to San Damiano is accounted for by other means than the wrath of an irate parent.

Mr. Gilliat-Smith is candid and honest, and does not disguise the fact that in some instances he "suspects" and "conjectures"; but of his impartiality in the interests of historico-critical truth there can be no doubt. This is perhaps his reason for being somewhat hard on Thomas of Celano, of his outspokenness on behalf of Brother Elias of Cortona, and of a perceptible diminution in appreciation of the lamblike qualities of Brother Leo, whose praises are in the "Fioretti"; while the Bollandists are laid under contribution to restore Brother Juniper to his (original) position of jaculator and not joculator Domini.

Of St. Clare herself the author draws an admirable picture, and her sanctity is none the less eminent because he considers her to have been a practical and strong-minded woman.

> In the first days of his generalship he [Brother John Parenti] fell foul of the Seraphic Mother in the matter of her chaplains and, like all who crossed swords with that redoubtable woman, he soon found himself shamefully worsted.

The story of St. Clare putting the Saracens to flight by appearing before them with the monstrance in her hands is vouched for by Thomas of Celano alone, and is not given in the bull of canonization of Nicholas IV or in any contemporary writer, and this inclines the author to the opinion of the above-mentioned Pontiff that the city was saved by the saint's prayers. The statement that St Clare was "tonsured" (page 53 et al) is somewhat perplexing, unless by that the author refers simply to the fact of the saint having her hair cut off when she received the religious habit from St. Francis. Mr. Gilliat-Smith denies with energy, the story of St. Clare and one of her nuns supping with St. Francis at the Portiuncula.

The second part of this book deals with the Rules observed by the Poor Ladies, and it is interesting to note how far the Rule was influenced by the Benedictine Rule. The Life is a very readable one and, in many respects, is apt to revolutionize the general ideas held regarding the foundation of the Franciscan Order; certainly, the author has succeeded in demolishing many of the pet ideas of those whom he terms "Franciscan sentimentalists," and has given us a work of great value to students on the life and times of St. Francis.

The Graves at Kilmorna, a Story of '67. By CANON P. A. SHEEHAN. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.35.

This, the last story written by Canon Sheehan, is simple, interesting in itself and serves to convey to his countrymen concern, hopes and fears excited in the writer by the present trend of things Irish. He divides it into two parts, which might well bear the titles of Ireland Patriotic and Ireland Political. The year '67 connotes the last abortive effort to overthrow the rule of England over Ireland. The trial and conviction of the hero for treason-felony gives Canon Sheehan an opportunity of putting before the public, in the "speech from the dock," the ideals and claims of Ireland, and ably does he avail himself of the occasion. The words of the judge, in passing sentence of death on the accused, state plainly and forcibly the position of England, and leave on the mind of the reader the realization that the days of physical force are over; and there is no escape from the conviction that ballots, not bullets, must free Ireland. The commutation of the death sentence into penal service in England gives the author an opening to expose the brutality exercised toward the political prisoner. The felon is pardoned, returns to Ireland, resumes an honorable business, but takes no part in politics. Ideals have changed, principles have worked loose, education, always anti-national, has become shallow, religious influence is weakened and selfishness is everywhere. It is a sad picture, but Canon Sheehan leaves us one ray of hope, the life typified by Mount Melleray. The author has written well his last caution to Ireland. P. J. D.

Your Pay Envelope. By JOHN R. MEADER. New York. The Devin-Adair Company. $1.00.

Anti-Christian Socialism. By REV. C. L. DRAWBRIDGE, M.A. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.40.

Mr. Meader, formerly editor of the Common Cause, has confined himself in his work to the economic aspects of socialism. His refutation of the fundamental Marxian principles is clear and popular. Particularly happy is his answer to the soap-box orator's promise of fabulous pay for little work under the socialist régime. Conservative socialists are content with holding out the hope of a six-hours' working day and a $2,000 wage. In the rosy horizon of the socialist future, however, there are no limits set to the shortening of hours and the raising of wages. The arithmetical calculation by which such promises are established is simple, but erroneous. To the fallacy that under socialism there will be less work and higher pay Mr. Meader opposes the nowise unimaginable possibility of there being no salary at all, but rather a big deficit. The author's implying, however, that we may justly "get the industries away from their present owners" if only the workers could absorb all the profits is unguarded. The assumption, moreover, that "the worker is justified in not being satisfied with his lot," admits of limitation and distinction. So too, while insisting upon the necessity of labor organizations, there is evident need of discrimination in our approval of existing conditions.

While Mr. Meader has produced a book that will excellently serve to refute the economic fallacies of socialism, the Reverend C. L. Drawbridge has confined himself to another aspect of the question: the prevalence of the atheistic element in socialism. His method of first offering without any hint at a solution, the entire socialist argument against Christianity and only in the latter and shorter part of the work making his reply, may not be the most prudent for popular purposes. The book is well suited, however, for the educated Christian reader seeking to prepare himself to meet the arguments of socialism. Though not a Catholic clergyman, the author is Catholic in his point of view. The treatment of socialists is fair, restrained and sane and the conclusion that "socialists tend to be irreligious and anti-Christian and that the opponents of religion tend to be socialists" is entirely just. Edward Rowland Sill, His Life and Work. By WILLIAM BELMONT PARKER. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.75.

The subject of this biography was a New Englander who wrote good verses and taught school with success. Particularly interesting are the chapters which describe his undergraduate days at Yale: 1857-1861. The college was then a sternly Puritan institution, relations between professors and pupils were most unsympathetic, and since the dreary Calvinism that pervaded the place drove young Sill into a revolt against revealed religion, we may add one more to the losses the dour Genevan's system has cost Christianity. The "great revival" that swept through the country in '58 was especially enthusiastic, of course, at Yale. All the students except Sill and a few others "joined forthwith the church," but this book records that the ensuing "reaction was frightful. There probably never was at Yale such an orgy of dissipation as during the following autumn."

After graduating Sill took ship for California, and there became a banking clerk and postmaster. He then began the study of law, then thought of medicine, and then went to Harvard to be a Unitarian minister. That career he soon gave up, however, and meditated going on the stage, but became instead a schoolmaster, and a good one, in Oakland. A large portion of his remaining years were devoted to the cause of education in California as he was closely identified with the beginnings of the State University and of Berkeley. Here is some excellent advice he gave a young teacher:

> 1. Don't care in the faintest possible degree what the children think of your doings. (You may think as much as you please of what they care for. They have tender little hearts.)
> 2. Don't try to do (or have them) two days' work in one. Little by little, and the least things first, and many times repeated.
> 3. Their education consist mainly in their working; not yours. Sometimes the teachers that work hardest do the poorest work, on that very account. (Your work out of school, of course, helps them: but I mean, in.)
> 4. If you find yourself getting excited, or talking loud, or moving quickly (i.e., hurriedly) just stop, and let the steam go down. Give the children something to do quietly, as a composition on "What I should like to have," or something, meantime.

Owing largely to his "liberal" religious opinions Professor Sill was obliged in 1882 to leave Berkeley. He at once devoted himself altogether to literature. He published a volume of poems, had a hand in starting the Overland Monthly and became a frequent contributor to the Atlantic. The last few years of his life Sill passed in Ohio, where he died unexpectedly in 1887. The selections the biographer has made from Mr. Sill's letters contain fine tributes to the teacher's high calling and show what excellent literary judgment the writer possessed. Though Mr. Parker's "Life" by being delayed ten years, has doubtless gained in many ways, had it been published in 1905, he probably would not have remarked that a certain "proposition was turned down." There are eight good pictures in the volume. W. D.

Elizabeth and Mary Stuart. By FRANK A. MUMBY. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $3.00.

The beginning of the feud between the English and Scottish queens is recounted in this volume, forming as it does one of a series that the author intends to give to the public, to illustrate the history of England by means of contemporary letters. In these pages we find the hopes and fears not only of the rival queens but of those in the public life of that very complex but interesting period of English history. The reader is given an insight into the duplicity of Elizabeth's character, her procrastinating policy in the marriage question, and her selfish and unpatriotic attitude toward the succession, that only such documents can furnish. Then too, the trying position of the hapless Queen of Scots, the effect of French influence on her girlhood days, her rivalry with Elizabeth and her infatuation for Darnley, are seen in the views of the time and from the standpoint of the sixteenth century.

Although a few of the letters are based on prejudice they reveal some of the secret workings of the foreign and domestic policy of Elizabethan England. The diplomatic intrigues of the first years of Elizabeth's reign and the early links in the chain of events that led to the climax in the tragedy of Mary Stuart, can be followed step by step in the correspondence of ambassadors and courtiers who watched every move with tense interest.

Mr. Mumby has endeavored to present an impartial contemporary narrative of a very bitter period in the Empire's history. His notes and comments on persons and events as they are unfolded before us in four hundred pages are fair and bespeak careful investigation and research. His frequent reference to Froude, however, does not add weight to the historical value of his work. On page 264 there is printed on the authority of Wright a resolution of the Pope's council at Rome in 1563, that is as ridiculous as it is false. It is the only stain on a clean piece of historical criticism. G. C. T.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In "The Lone Star Ranger," the book heading the list of January's "best-sellers," there are so many "bluggy" shootings that twenty years ago the story would have been bound in paper covers and sold for ten cents. The dime novel, however, was clean, which this book is not. "The Eyes of the World," already noticed in AMERICA, is a dangerous novel that manages to keep "popular," and "The Patrol of the Sun Dance Trail" is a harmless tale of the Canadian Mounted Police. In "Mr. Grex of Monte Carlo," Mr. Oppenheim has written a novel which is no better nor worse than its many predecessors. He has undoubted power, which it is to be regretted he has again devoted to a story of marital intrigue. "The Pastor's Wife" can not be recommended, but in "Bambi," the last of the six on the Bookman's list, there is no great harm. In announcing "The Ragged Messenger" ($1.35), Bobbs Merrill Company are at pains to assure the public that no matter what may have been said of the author's previous volume, no charge of salaciousness can be brought against the present powerfully written work. In spite of their protest, there is a taint in the book which, if not exactly salacious, is far too realistic to make it a fit novel for any young person, or acceptable reading for any Catholic.

A "First Book for Italians," written by Bernard H. Burke, (Edward E. Babb & Co. Boston) is well adapted to its purpose. The lessons are so arranged that the beginner can easily improve his knowledge of English gradually and without fear of being confronted with any words which would be hard to pronounce and still harder to spell. The author's aim is to be as simple as possible. The double arrangement of the sounds of the alphabet, and the words preceding each lesson which are followed by their equivalent in Italian will help the student to learn our language rapidly. The book should prove of great value to our Italian immigrants.

The March Catholic World opens with a well-written paper by Dr. Edmund G. Shanahan, entitled "A Returning Caveman," in which it is pointed out that the boasted "after-Christian morality" owes all that is good in it to the influence of the Christian tradition on public opinion. There follows an interesting sketch of Cardinal Mercier's personality and career, by W. P. H. Kitchin; an examination of "Hamlet," by Father McNabb for autobiographical data regarding its author; a good picture of Paris in war time, by Charles Bans-san, in which he indicates the religious change that has come over France by this anecdote:

> Recently, Paris learned of the death of a young and talented writer, M. Ernest Pischari, killed at the head of the battery of which he was lieutenant. He was the grandson of Renan. He was a Dominican Tertiary, and had just resolved to enter a religious order when the war broke out. In the midst of his occupations, even in the army, he never neglected the daily recital of his breviary. The book his grandfather, Renan, had flung away he picked up and used faithfully. In the words of his own hero in "The Call to Arms," "he stood with his fathers against his father." We have here, it would seem, a picture of France herself, the France of to-day returning to her traditions, the Paris that rivets our attention, a calm Paris, a Paris no longer frivolous, no longer skeptical, a Paris that believes.

John Ayscough contributes a critical estimate of Swinburne, Hardy and Meredith; and Dudley G. Wooten reviews Mexico's history since she broke away from Spain ninety-three years ago.

A new edition has been published of Archbishop Landriot's "The Valiant Woman" (Burns and Oates, 2 shillings), a series of seventeen instructions he gave, when Bishop of La Rochelle, to the Ladies of the Society of Charity. The discourses are practical, reflect, as was to be expected, social conditions that prevail in France, and have been well translated by Helena Lyons.——In "An Eight Days' Retreat for Religious" (Herder, $1.50), the Rev. Henry A. Gabriel, S.J., has arranged a development of the Exercises that those who "make their points" privately will find of value. The author acknowledges his indebtedness to Fathers Roothan, Meschler, Nonell, etc., and suggests readings, patrons, and the like, for each day of the retreat.

"The Elder Miss Ainsborough" (Benziger, $1.25), the central figure of a new novel by Marian Ames Taggart, is painfully unselfish, while her half-sister, younger by a decade, is selfish with an intensity which deepens with years. The fond devotion and self-suppression of the elder sister are potent factors in the spoiling of the younger. "Devotion is like most things," says their keen-witted old Aunt Huldah. "It needs mixing with sense." In the dear school of experience the heroine is gradually, and through many tribulations, brought to her senses. To supply the needful tribulation, the hero acts at critical moments with exasperating obtuseness. Through the adroit intervention of Aunt Huldah "The Elder Miss Ainsborough" is at last happily wedded. The story is simply and forcefully told and is worth telling.

EDUCATION

A Model of Higher Perfection

"IT is certainly very cold," said Peggotty. "Everybody must feel it so."

"I feel it more than other people," said Mrs. Gummidge.

The cold winds of investigation, our favorite indoor sport, have been bearing down of late upon our huge and efficient Commissions for the Relief of Indigent Colleges, our Punjab Medical Boards, our Institutions for Medical Research, and our other moneyed embodiments of modern charity and education. For a time, there was talk of low barometers and scudding rack, for the weather promised to be squally, and the harbor bar was already moaning. It appeared possible that the gentlemen, whose funds finance these modern charities, might be given an occasion of wailing with Mrs. Gummidge, that they were "lone, lorn creeturs," with whom "everythink went contrairy."

A VANQUISHED ÆOLUS

But the storm lifted, heading toward Chicago, with Mr. Walsh in the rôle of a vanquished Æolus. Again the skies are blue. Once more the soft winds of approbation, wafted by grateful beneficiaries, call with the voice of spring, and the Rockefeller and Carnegie Foundations lift up starry eyes in joy to the fretted vault. Oil and steel are looking up, too, in the markets of the world. A grand harmonious chaunt of love and rest and meek-eyed peace, led by those eminent educators, Messrs. Carnegie, Rockefeller, and Starr J. Murphy, soothes and encircles our whirling orb. Their sole purpose in life is to do all the good they can, from Colorado and Kamtchatka even to the steppes of Tartary. In the effulgence of this nobility, let all carping criticism sink into ignoble silence. For the fate of the world is joy, when our paths are smoothed by hands that are perfect. The price of steel and oil may rise and soar, and be lifted, but the vulgar proceeds are for the uplifting of you and me. A new thing has obtained a place in the sun. Saints there are, who have given their lives for the perfecting of their kind. Few, if any, have engaged in trade for the same purpose. By day and by night, Messrs. Carnegie and Rockefeller with their miners, agents and operatives, toil for us. They work while we sleep. A sweetly solemn thought.

THEY FEEL IT MORE

Heading, as was remarked, for Chicago, the Interstate Commission has ceased from troubling the Models of Higher Perfection in New York. The Commission gave us nothing new, except the spectacle of the good Mr. Carnegie in the guise of a comic monologue artist, but it did a good work in retelling some old stories that need retelling. Likewise it brought into the field of ascertained knowledge the fact that Foundations with blanket-charters, and persons like Dr. Eliot, do not like to be investigated. They feel it more than other people.

Considering Dr. Eliot, it appears that many of his answers before the Commission were enveloped with an atmosphere of hurt surprise. The possibility that the omniscience of a President-Emeritus of Harvard might be questioned by a Missouri lawyer, seems never to have swum into Dr. Eliot's ken. For has he not written a book on chemistry, guided a University, given to the world an elective system which is fast being discarded? Has he not with infinite art compressed within the brief compass of sixty inches, the choice marrow of the world's best books, hazarding the absurd supposition that by feeding on it for a quarter of an hour daily, one may achieve an education? Has he not, moreover, told us upon what mental pabulum the budding intellects and tender imaginations of our seven-year-old children must be nourished? And has he not developed at least two new varieties of an ancient philosophic heresy, dubbing them, with all the pomp of bell, book and candle, "world-religion"?

DR. ELIOT'S CREDENTIALS

These are credentials not lightly to be eschewed. But in war time, passports are scanned with care. If elaborated, signed and sealed by the bearer himself, suspicion grows apace. Dr. Eliot has no greater admirer than the President-Emeritus of Harvard. The President-Emeritus of Harvard has no more devoted follower than Dr. Eliot. Great are the uses of advertisement, as none know better than Dr. Eliot and the President-Emeritus of Harvard. Hence, while an air of hurt surprise pervaded the answers of the President-Emeritus of Harvard to the Commission, its source and origin are to be found in a genuine wonderment that any should presume to question the all-embracing perfection of Dr. Eliot.

Thus, for instance, Dr. Eliot can not see what harmful influence may possibly be exerted upon an institution of learning by a bonded corporation which makes a specialty of introducing into religious schools, a new line of non-sectarian education and religion. He is led to this conclusion by the fact that this bonded corporation actually gave the Harvard Medical School a larger slice of financial pudding than this dear child of Dr. Eliot had asked for. Now, to be sure, a medical school, fathered by Dr. Eliot, is sans peur et sans reproche. Anything with which Dr. Eliot may connect himself is, by the fact, a sharer in his perfection. Mark Twain once wrote that information seemed to stew out of him, i.e., Mark Twain, naturally, like the precious ottar of roses out of the otter. So too does perfection exude from Dr. Eliot. He has more than the magic touch once attributed to kings, and all of the king's present prerogative of being unable to do wrong.

HARVARD LOGIC

Again, he apprehends no peril in the fact that the legal restraints, noted in the charters of these bloated Foundations, are but loose and airy. They can not go wrong, he says, because men of the highest character, even such as himself, constitute the self-perpetuating Board of Trustees. Dullards may hold this the precise point at issue. These Foundations are in no sense a menace, because their directors and trustees are self-sacrificing toilers for the common good, argues Dr. Eliot. Similarly, the trustees and directors can not be a menace because, on their own testimony, and Dr. Eliot's, they are noble, unselfish laborers for the public weal. Into the hands of pundits, blanket-charters, charters loosely written, with powers vaguely defined, may be safely entrusted; charters highly dangerous to the State, were they, by some excursion into the impossible, granted to a Catholic Educational Association with an equal sum of money at its disposal. It is time to talk of more definite legal restraint, it is argued, when the event has proved that these blanket-charters have been abused. This, too, is an argument unapproved by common sense, and new in jurisprudence. It was elaborated in the brain of the genius who bids you not to worry about bolts and bars until by rifling your house, thieves justify the existence of locksmiths.

Interlocking directorates are frowned upon by the majority of economists and jurists, but Dr. Eliot thinks them of the highest value, when they include such persons as the President-Emeritus of Harvard. It is fairly clear that Dr. Eliot is accustomed to judge of all things by that ultimate standard of perfection which, he conceives, is himself. To read and write, says Dogberry, comes by nature. No merely human person, even by dint of labor and much midnight Standard oil, could have acquired a tithe of the perfect knowledge which flows from Dr. Eliot, as waters from the rock of Horeb upon a parched and fainting world. Hence, it must be that Dr. Eliot is a kind of Superman, of whom perfection is a natural attribute.

DOGBERRY'S COMMISSION

Too long has the President-Emeritus of Harvard been accepted at his own valuation. At Harvard, he evinced a fine financial genius, and a keen sense of the value of advertising. He has a following not composed, notably, of discriminating educators, but of the snappers-up of unconsidered trifles. As a publicity agent, he would undoubtedly be of value to any large manufacturing or mercantile establishment. But as a dogmatizer—and who can dogmatize like Dr. Eliot?—on matters of religion and education, his commission is a fellow to that written by an immortal for the Second Watchman: "You are thought to be the most senseless and fit man for the constable of the watch; therefore bear you the lantern." Under this commission, Dr. Eliot has been suffered to bear the lantern for many a year. But its brief taper was long since extinguished. P. L. B.

SOCIOLOGY

State Pensions for Widows

IT is probably true that Catholic teachers of morality lay greater stress upon obedience than upon any other virtue. Submission to lawful authority in Church and State they look upon as fundamental. "Fear God and honor the king," and "Give to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and to God, the things that are God's," are principles which the child imbibes in his first instructions.

It is only by a natural sequence, then, that Catholics are a typically peaceful folk, noted for a spirit of conservatism which at times has been interpreted as sluggishness, or indifference to the common good. And yet it is not indifference. Rather, it is conscientiousness. Religion does not necessarily impart a sense of civic and political values. Nor does it, except to those whose eyes have been cleared by years of deep and simple faith, give that delicacy of perception which, while it measures accurately the things that we must give to Cæsar, does not lessen the measure of our loyalty to God.

CONSERVATIVE CATHOLICS

It is precisely because of their loyalty to God and the State, therefore, that the average Catholic is disposed to view with disapproval the assumption by the State of any new or hitherto untried powers. The American Catholic, in particular, loves the maxim that a country is best governed when governed least. Bureaucracy, officialdom, even the necessary secrecy of a justifiable diplomacy, are abhorrent to his mind. He looks askance when he hears that by stretching the inter-state commerce clause of the Constitution, the Government now justifies its protectorate over the fish that migrate between Virginia and Maryland waters. Hence it is not surprising, that our average Catholic is disposed to look upon the bulk of what we are terming "social legislation," as socialistic, or as the expression of gross paternalism. Perhaps his view is correct.

PATERNALISTIC LEGISLATION

There can be little doubt, for instance, that certain measures adopted in many communities for the protection of children, are absurdly and unnecessarily paternalistic. They break down the sense of parental responsibility, a country's greatest asset, by shifting it to the State, normally the court of last, not first, appeal. Moreover, they weaken the moral fiber of the child himself. Certainly no child should be deprived of what is necessary for his physical well-being. No one wishes to see a child hungry or insufficiently clad. But even in the early stages of character-development, adversity has its value. The fact that a small percentage of school children in certain large cities are in need of food and clothing, is certainly no valid reason to throw upon the city the burden of supporting all, even those not in want. This is pauperizing child and parent alike. Moreover, after destroying parental responsibility, it opens a ready door, if not to actual dishonesty, at least, to something very like dishonesty.

Students of this question report that in some American communities, where meals are furnished either at actual cost, or gratuitously to school children, not a few penny-pinching parents will make use of these opportunities, not because they are unable to feed their children, but because they see no reason why they should make expenditures for this purpose when the community offers to shoulder the expense. If food, books, clothing, transportation are to be free at all, they must be made free to all the children alike. To set aside a certain number of the children as the recipients of public bounty, would be the last step in pauperizing. Reports, grossly exaggerated, of underfed or starving school children in New York, have been circulated throughout the country, and have been used as arguments for free meals. Yet according to the New York Sun, the number of children in need of assistance certainly does not exceed one per cent. of the total enrolment.

UNDERLYING PRINCIPLE OF THE PENSION ACT

But there are other forms of social legislation opposed, and probably unwisely opposed, by the average Catholic. One such measure is known as the Widows' Pension Law, now administered, apparently with success, in many States and communities, but vigorously fought in New York and other States. To its opponents, this form of public relief seems an unwarranted and wholly unnecessary extension of the paternal functions of the State.

Neither count of this indictment seems valid. Catholic philosophers and jurists hold that to provide for the individual in those things in which he can not suitably provide for himself, is not merely a possible function, but a strict duty of the State. It is this principle which justifies the appropriation of public funds for private relief. It is argued that dependent persons, in the present instance destitute widows, can not, without imperiling higher interests, provide for themselves. The higher interest in question is the preservation of the home upon which, in large measure, depends the proper training of the child. If by reason of the death of the father, the family's bread-winner, the mother is forced to leave a young family to seek work, it is obvious that the children are perforce abandoned to their own devices and, in many instances, especially in large cities, these devices are not good, either morally or physically. It may happen, however, that the mother may decide to break up the family by placing the children in institutions. Public institutions are supported from the public funds, private institutions by the contributions of the charitable. The Widows' Pension Law proposes to use these funds, which in any case ultimately come from the public, in such a manner as to enable the mother to keep the family together. In this there is certainly no trace of socialism, or of usurpation on part of the State of undue authority.

ACTUAL CONDITIONS

It will be at once objected, that this purpose can be better effected by private charity. In the ideal order, yes, and perhaps practically in some communities. But what if the burden is beyond the resources of private charity? That this is the case in many larger American communities, seems fairly plain. The actual facts have wrought a change of heart in many an ardent opponent of this measure, which the New York General Assembly now has under consideration.

In New York, Chicago, Philadelphia and St. Louis, it is fairly clear that the private charitable associations can not begin to care properly for indigent widows seeking relief at their hands. The problem has been carefully studied, appeals have been made to the public, all funds have been administered with the utmost economy and, with each succeeding year, conditions have become more distressing. By reason of the smaller funds at their disposal, Catholic societies are even more hampered than the non-sectarian foundations. The majority, almost ninety per cent., of the dependent widows maintained by the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, are Catholics. Most of these women have young families. What is to become of the home influence, infinitely superior to the best of institutions, if the mother is forced to seek work outside the home? Experience shows that in this case, one or other of two things happens, almost by necessity. The ordinary course is that the child becomes a truant, and truancy, as a New York Chief Attendance Officer witnesses, is the first step to irregular habits far more serious in their effects. The other course is that the child, or children, is sent to an institution. If it is a State institution, the Catholic child frequently makes shipwreck of his faith. If it is a Catholic institution, he will be well cared for, but it is quite impossible to reproduce home conditions even in the best of institutions. And a growing child needs the influence of these conditions almost as much as an unweaned infant needs its mother's milk. In any case, you and I foot the bill. Would it not be infinitely preferable to pay this money, under proper restriction, to the mother, and thus enable her to keep the family together?

THEORY AND PRACTICE

It is, of course, far easier, to justify the principle of the Widows' Pension Law, than to draft a suitable law, or to administer it properly, once it is put on the statute book. The drafting may take an era of unfortunate experiences with pseudo-widows and grafting or incompetent officials. Certainly, provision should be made that from its administration, the political organizations and the charity trusts be excluded with impartial thoroughness. This is no small task. But the underlying principle of the proposed law is sound. It is imperative that these dependent persons be assisted. Neither private charity nor the Church can render this help. The conclusion is obvious. What should recommend this proposed legislation most strongly to Catholics, is the fact that it is calculated to keep the family together.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Some weeks ago the Chicago Tribune saw the light, refused "Pastor" Russell's advertisements, and apologized to its readers for the few already published. This action was not based upon an objection to any religion which the "Pastor" might have at heart, but upon reasons stated in the form of a biography of the "Pastor," published in the Tribune in daily instalments. The biography was fairly detailed, and can hardly afford pleasant reading to the "Pastor" or to his devoted following. The Tribune's example has now been followed by the Chicago Herald. The New York Evening Post, however, while announcing daily at the head of its editorial column that > the design of this paper is to diffuse among the people correct information on all interesting subjects, to inculcate just principles in religion, morals, and politics; and to cultivate a taste for sound literature continues to publish the "Pastor's" advertisements.

On February 22 the Reverend Mother de Loe was elected General of the Religious of the Sacred Heart, by the General Congregation assembled in Rome. The new Mother General was born in the Rhineland of a Belgian mother and a German father. Her family has long been distinguished for its interest in the welfare of the Church, one of her uncles, General de Loe, doing heroic service for Catholics during the Kulturkampf. Mother de Loe, who was educated at Blumenchal, Holland, has had a distinguished career. At twenty-six she was mistress of novices in Brussels; later, in 1889, she went to Italy, where she held various important offices, becoming first mistress-general of studies in an important convent in Rome, then superintendent of the same convent and mistress of novices, too, and finally, in 1896, Vicar of all the Italian houses. On the death of the lamented Mother Stuart, Mother de Loe became Vicar-general, and now the General Congregation has conferred upon her the high but difficult office of General.

Last spring, a lady pleaded, as a disinterested lover of art and morality, in favor of certain "uplifting" films which had proved too much for even New York's "broad-minded" censors. Her devotion was touching, until she sued the film company for her wages. At present this facile advocate is arguing before a legislative committee, for the abolition of capital punishment in New York. "Let there be no more taking of young lives at Sing Sing," she sobs, referring presumably, to the timely taking off of certain criminals, who labored earnestly to introduce the law of the jungle into the metropolis. This lady will do no good to any cause to which she may attach herself, or for which she may be retained. It is to be hoped, therefore, that she will plead long and earnestly for the abolition of the death penalty in the State of New York.

Retreats for laymen are taking a firmer hold on the people. This is evident not only from the growing interest manifested by the laymen themselves, and this in many cities, but also from the greater willingness to make sacrifices in order to foster the work that has been marked in many religious communities. Greater effectiveness is being obtained by more careful differentiation into groups. Thus, for example, one finds retreats for working men and for working girls, for school children and for school teachers, for Christian mothers and for Children of Mary. Professional and business men also have been given an opportunity to study their difficulties and obligations; but for the most part they have their three days of retirement together, and have listened to instructions on duties common to them all rather than on the needs peculiar to themselves. This year, however, in New York City physicians are to have a retreat for themselves alone during the week beginning March 21. This is the second annual retreat of the kind, last year's effort having met with most gratifying success, as it gathered together not only Catholic doctors, but some Protestants as well. It is especially fitting that such a retreat should be held in the chapel of a Catholic hospital. The plan that has been inaugurated at Saint Vincent's Hospital will no doubt be taken up in many another Catholic hospital.

"Why do Catholics object to the convent-inspection bills?" This question, usually put in bad faith, comes as a rule from the vulgar, or from the benighted denizens of the backwoods who still believe that the "revelations" of the notorious Maria Monk are true. Occasionally, however, the question is asked in good faith. To these it may be answered, that convents, and similar institutions, in-so-far as they are the recipients of a public trust, readily submit to examination and, as a matter of fact, such examinations are common. Their private affairs, however, are their own, just as yours are. If a Catholic institution receives public funds for services rendered, no one objects to an auditing of receipts and expenditures, by the proper authority. If it receives the community's wards from the courts, it makes regular reports upon the care given these unfortunate children, and their progress. Further examination, touching the private concerns of the community, is of no concern to the public. Hostility to the Church and her institutions, the offspring either of unspeakable ignorance, or of a heart saturated with vileness, is responsible for the "convent-inspection" bills which, from time to time, appear before State legislatures.

It is part of the usual procedure of the General Congregation which meets for the election of a General of the Society of Jesus, to proceed, after the main purpose of the meeting has been accomplished, to the enactment of such legislation as changing conditions of the times seem to demand. In accordance with this practice the Congregation of the Society, which is now in session in Rome, has modified the external organization of the Society in a way which intimately touches the United States. With a view to facilitating the transaction of business, the Jesuits of the world are grouped together into what are called Assistancies, each of which is represented in the Curia at Rome by an Assistant who, after his election by the General Congregation, resides at Rome and takes a most important part in the government of the S ciety. Heretofore, at least of recent years, there have been five such groups, the English, French, German, Italian and Spanish Assistancies. Under the English Assistancy were united the Jesuits of Canada, England, Ireland and the United States. Of late, however, the Jesuits in the United States have so rapidly increased, their works have become so numerous and extensive, and their interests so important, that it has been deemed advisable to create a new Assistancy for North America alone. It is composed of the Provinces of the United States, known as California, Maryland-New York, Missouri, New Orleans and the Province of Canada. The representative of the American Assistancy is the Rev. Thomas J. Gannon, a man well known in the Eastern States, who has held almost every position of trust in the gift of the Maryland-New York Province.

In Holy Week of last year the rules and customs of the Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth, based on the original rule of St. Vincent de Paul, were submitted to the Holy See. On February 19, the Sisters received from the Sacred Congregation of Regulars an authentic copy of the Constitutions, together with the Decree in Praise of their Institute and Constitutions. But one important change was enjoined. Hereafter the Sisters will take perpetual, instead of yearly vows. The zeal displayed by these devoted followers of Christ has done much to further the progress of the Church in the West. More than five hundred now call St. Mary's Academy, Leavenworth, Kansas, "home." They labor in thirty-eight houses, located in the dioceses of Leavenworth, Kansas City, Lincoln, Denver, Cheyenne, Great Falls, Helena, and in the Archdiocese of Santa Fé. Our religious women are a source of untold blessing to any community favored by their presence. Their voices are not heard in the market-place, nor do they prattle the nonsense, and worse, of feminism. Calmly, gently, perseveringly, they pick up the duties left unfinished by a world that has no time for God and duty. It is their zeal and sacrifice alone, that make possible the thousands of institutions throughout the country where, day by day, the minds and hearts of little children are turned to God, where suffering humanity is soothed, and taught to bear with patience and, at last, to kiss the Cross. And so the fine and delicate, yet strong, skein of their lives is woven by days that tell of tasks accepted for God's children, by nights that speak in silent prayer to God, the Father of us all. The beautiful devotion of the Sisters of Charity of Leavenworth, that has made their name a hallowed title throughout the West, will doubtless receive new impetus from the approbation which has been bestowed upon their congregation. May God's blessing rest upon them, strengthening their hands for the labors that remain.

Maryland, which was so prominent in the formation of an International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ, has now placed the foundations for a successful State Federation. The Organization Convention held for this purpose at Baltimore, February 20 and 21, was attended by a large number of representatives from twelve Alumnæ associations of the Archdiocese of Baltimore. The object of the Federation, as Mrs. James J. Sheeran, Chairman of the Permanent Organization Committee of the International Federation of Catholic Alumnæ, explained, is to render the different alumnæ associations throughout the Baltimore archdiocese mutually helpful and to unite them into a thoroughly organized body that can demand consideration for the cause it represents. With true Catholic instinct the speaker added:

> While we hope to encourage the social side of our alumnae associations, we, as Catholics, must have no false standards regarding class. The charity that is born of religion makes no favorites because of social standing. No matter where our Alma Mater may be, no matter who instructed us, we meet on the common ground of Catholic Higher Education. This is the call that bids every alumnae association to lend the force of its numbers to a general recognition of the work of our educators. We must become a proof that there is an immense body of Catholic women who have received the benefit of higher education. Do not ask, "What will the International Federation do for our individual alumnae association?" but rather, "In what way may our organization strengthen and support the rest?"

These are noble words, which should not be without their effect. On Sunday, February 21, a reception was given, at which His Eminence Cardinal Gibbons presided. In a well-deserved tribute bestowed by him upon our Catholic Sisterhoods he proposed that the aim of the new organization should be to deepen in each member love and gratitude for her Alma Mater, and to increase above all her knowledge and love of that greater Alma Mater, Mother Church. Addresses were delivered by Mgr. C. F. Thomas, Mgr. William A. Fletcher and Reverend William J. Ennis, S.J., President of Loyola College. Dr. Capen, of the United States Bureau of Education, representing Commissioner P. P. Claxton, offered the fullest service of that department and its cooperation toward perfecting still more the excellent standard of the institutions represented by the association.

Rev. Michael Martin, S.J., Professor of Canon Law in St. Louis University, died in St. Louis on February 23. Father Martin was born in Ireland, July 20, 1846, and was educated at St. Macarten's College, Monaghan, and at Maynooth, where he was ordained in 1870. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1885, and after a further course in theology at Woodstock College, Maryland, was assigned to pastoral duties in Cincinnati and St. Louis. In 1899, Father Martin was appointed to the chair of Moral Theology in St. Louis University, which he retained until 1910, when he was made professor of Canon Law. He was a frequent contributor to ecclesiastical magazines, and published "Notes on Slater's Moral Theology," and "The Roman Curia." Father Martin will long be remembered for his great learning, his exquisite courtesy, and his deep and simple piety.

5% First Mortgage Notes

Catholic Church Property in Chicago

Executed and signed by the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, by James Edward Quigley, Archbishop

These Notes are a direct obligation of the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, a Corporation Sole, created by a special act of the Legislature of Illinois, and legal title to all the property covered by these Mortgage Notes is vested in this Corporation. These Notes are secured by First Mortgage on certain and specified pieces of property. They are further secured by all the church property of the Archdiocese of Chicago. Principal and interest are absolutely secured and the Notes will be converted into cash at their face value by us at any time you may wish to realize upon them. A safe, sound, and stable convertible investment.

In Denominations of $500 and $1000

Maturing in one to ten years

Maturing interest coupons and principal Notes may be deposited in your own bank for collection or forwarded direct to us. Just as secure—just as safe and in every essential detail just as desirable as placing your money in the best managed savings bank in the United States.

Not Affected by War Conditions.

These Notes constitute an investment that can not in any way be weakened in value by periods of business depression, war conditions abroad or other causes that have lessened the market value of most industrial and railroad bonds and securities of other description.

Redeemable at Face Value

These Notes will be redeemed by us at their face value if you wish to convert the Notes into cash. We will charge only a small sum for redeeming them.

Any Banker in Chicago

can inform you of the character of these Notes and will also acquaint you with our standing.

The Security Increases Each Year

The value of the Catholic Church property in the Chicago Archdiocese has kept step with the vigorous growth of new parishes. The real estate covered by these Notes is located in some of the choicest sections of the city of Chicago and is increasing in value. Though a certain number of the Notes are payable annually, none of the security is to be released until all Notes shall have been paid. In this way the security behind this investment becomes relatively greater each year. Send to-day for full information, details, etc. We will be pleased to submit a full description of the Notes. Send the coupon.

Ask any Chicago banker if he considers these Notes a safe and very desirable investment.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made

A SPECIAL EDUCATIONAL RATE

Applicable to Teachers and Students in Catholic Schools only

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

CATHOLIC MIND

Have Been Circulated Since June Last

Are you among those who have actively helped in thus propagating the Truth? These attractive pamphlets are now everywhere recognized among the most effective weapons the militant Catholic has. Published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. The price is nominal. Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

NUMBER 4, VOL. XIII, FEBRUARY 22

"SIXTY HISTORICAL 'DON'TS'"

By Dr. James J. Walsh, is a tersely worded and highly informing paper that opens the current CATHOLIC MIND. The article will prove a good corrective for misstatements about the Church's rôle in history. Civilization and culture are terms that are often confused nowadays. In "What Is Civilization?" Father Henry Woods, S.J., clearly explains the difference. Scornful flings at the "Illiterate Latins" who colonized Mexico and South America are of frequent occurrence in periodicals. The third paper in this issue is a reminder by Father Walter Dwight, S.J., of what Catholic Spain did to promote literature and education in the New World prior to the founding of Harvard and the publication of the "Bay Psalm-Book."

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.

The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. LONELINESS?

The Story of a Soul

12mo. Cloth. - $1.35 net. Postage extra

The late Mgr. Benson's knowledge of English life and character was marvelously wide and profound, and his power to describe this life quite unique. None of his earlier books surpasses "Loneliness" in wealth of imagery, keen analysis and literary craftsmanship.

Ready Early in March

POEMS

Printed on Japan Vellum, with a portrait in photogravure.

Attractively bound in cloth, 12mo, gilt top, 85 pages. 75 cents net. Postage extra.

This collection of Mgr. Benson's intimate and beautiful verse contains also Canon Sharrock's moving account of his last hours and death, and a Preface.

NORAH OF WATERFORD

By Rosa Mulholland

12mo. Cloth. - $1.10 net. Postage extra.

The charm of this story, from the pen of Rosa Mulholland, lies not so much in the novelty of the plot as in the keen insight into Irish life afforded on almost every page.—America.

CHRONICLE

The War.—The official reports from Paris and Berlin are so contradictory that it is difficult to form a correct judgment on the results of the week's fighting. It seems, however, that the French have made some slight progress along the dunes in Belgium, but have been obliged to fall back south of Ypres and north of Arras. The city of Reims has again been subjected by the Germans to a severe bombardment. In the Champagne district the French have made repeated and vigorous attacks and claim to have advanced at Mesnil and to the west and northwest of Perthes, where, however, the German resistance has inflicted severe losses. At Vauquois, in the Argonne, bitter fighting and heavy cannonading has resulted in some minor gains for the Allies. Violent engagements are reported from the Vosges and the Munster valley near Sulzern, from the region north of Verdun and west of Pont-a-Mousson. It would appear, therefore, that the advantage has been for the most part with the Allies, but in all cases it has been so slight as to leave the general line practically unchanged.

Bulletin, Mar. 2, p. m.-Mar. 9, a. m.

Success of the Allies

In the east something like a deadlock has followed upon the rapid changes that marked the end of February. Not that there has been any cessation of desperate fighting; in fact, from the Vistula to the Niemen, attacks and counter attacks have gone on almost continuously. With the exception, however, of the region north of Przasnysz, where the Russians have driven the Germans back toward the frontier and blocked the turning movement which for a time seems to have seriously threatened the right wing of the Russian army before Mlawa, neither side has gained anything like a decided victory. The Germans have concentrated their offensive mainly on the assault against Osowiec, which has so far failed. The Russians have been on the offensive at many points of the lines, west and northwest of Grodno, near Augustowo, east of Lomza, north of Przasnysz, and at Plock, but they have nowhere gained much ground.

Deadlock in Poland

Indications point to a general abandonment of driving tactics by the Germans. Apparently they are at present mainly concerned with the task of securing the territory they have won, and with strengthening their lines. These, as far as can be determined from the scanty information that is available, seem to run through the province of Suwalki, east of the eastern boundary of East Prussia, from Simno to the river Bobr. Turning west they follow the river Bobr, pass through Jedzabno, and continue in a direction that is more or less parallel to the southern frontier of East Prussia until they reach the Vistula at Plock. Unless the Germans can reduce the fortress of Osowiec, against which it is admitted they have brought up their heavy guns, no important change in the situation in North Poland is likely to take place.

Although both sides are agreed on the sanguinary character of the fighting of the week, Vienna and Petrograd give diametrically opposite reports of the situation in Galicia. Austria claims to have gained everywhere, Russia states that the Austrians have been forced back everywhere except in a few passes in the Carpathians. This probably means local but unimportant gains for both sides. Czernowitz is reported, but without official confirmation, to have been evacuated by the Austrians.

Galicia

The bombardment of the Dardanelles is slowly but inexorably proceeding. Thirteen miles of the strait have already been cleared of mines, and the Turks seem powerless to prevent their removal. For several days the operations of the Allied fleet were interfered with by rough weather, but they have been resumed, and the work of demolishing the fortifications goes steadily on. The most powerful and recent ships of France and Great Britain and one Russian battleship are shelling the forts at the narrows by relays, and it is reported that Fort Dardanos, on the Asiatic side, has been silenced. Three French cruisers have taken up positions on the Ægean coast at a point opposite to the strong fort of Kalid Bahr, which is situated on the European side of the strait, and, under the wireless direction of warships at the mouth of the Dardanelles, are throwing shells across the peninsula and over the hills into the fort. Their fire is said to be accurate and to have caused considerable damage. Other French cruisers have proceeded further north along the peninsula and have entered the Gulf of Saros, where they have begun a destructive fire on the line of forts that stretches along the narrow strip of land at Bulair, and effectively bars any approach by land. These cruisers are thus preparing the way for the land invasion, which is said to be under the direction of the French, and which is expected to begin as soon as the forts have been destroyed.

The Turks profess to feel no alarm. They say that the outer forts were weak and their fall was not a surprise; the inner forts, however, so they claim, are impregnable. They state, moreover, that three of the cruisers of the Allied fleet have been badly damaged. The difficulties of the Turks are likely to be much increased, if it is true, as has been reported but without official confirmation, that a strong Russian fleet is on its way through the Black Sea to the Bosporus, with the purpose of bombarding the eastern approach to Constantinople and of locking the Turkish fleet in the Sea of Marmora. Another British fleet, the East Indian squadron, has begun operations against Smyrna. It is reported that the ships have already forced their way past the outer defences of the Gulf of Smyrna.

Austria-Hungary.—Both Austria and Hungary have, so far, passed successfully through the economic crisis of the war. Considerable provisions were at hand in the latter country, which, it is said, was even able to send large quantities of food to Germany and Austria. Fortunately for the inhabitants, the fertile areas of land in Hungary are situated in the interior of the country, and not within the zone of the war. Great care has likewise been taken to prevent any shortage in food supplies. Thus a decree was passed long ago making it compulsory to mix wheat flour with flour made of rye, grain, potatoes and rice. Such was Hungary's precaution against a shortage. Austria, in a similar manner, has been able to provide food even for the needy portion of the population, owing to the manner in which the situation has been taken in hand by the people themselves. The question of the future is mainly an agrarian problem. It is asked whether the working forces will suffice for the tillage of the soil, since it is reckoned that three-fifths of the farmers and farm laborers are actually under arms. At present this seems a serious difficulty; in the end its solution may come from the labor of the women. It may be necessary, too, for the Government to give considerable assistance to the small farmer who, in many cases, has suffered severely. Reports indicate, however, that conditions are not as bad as painted by the press despatches.

France.—Although the financial outlay has been enormous, it can not be said, either that France is suffering at present from lack of funds, or that any financial stringency seems likely. Nor while the loss of soldiers by death and capture has been great, is this circumstance alone the source of the uneasiness which several learned societies have begun to discuss. The real evil, it is now recognized, is the effect upon the country within the next decade of the low birthrate from which France has long been suffering, coupled with the losses caused by the war. The war has brought to the fore a serious evil, hitherto of little interest to the public; in 1902, and again in 1912, the Government had appointed parliamentary commissions "to investigate the question of depopulation, and to recommend measures for combating the evils which threaten the extinction of the nation." Some of the published findings are extremely interesting. In 1801 the number of births in France was 1,007,000. One hundred and ten years later this number had fallen to 742,114. In 1897 the births exceeded the deaths by 108,000. Fourteen years later the deaths outnumbered the births by 34,869. "It is only France," writes a non-Catholic critic, "that makes war upon religion and which suffers in consequence this peculiarly distressing consequence." But with the revival of religion a brighter day will surely dawn for the Eldest Daughter of the Church, and if France, through her baptism of blood, is led back to the Church, the price which she is paying for her redeeming may well be counted small.

The Real Evil

Germany.—The most important domestic problem facing Germany at the present moment concerns the food supply plans. Systematic attempts were made from the very beginning of the war to conserve or multiply the provisions of the Empire. The danger of shortage, however, did not seem sufficiently imminent to disconcert the people seriously. From the first the Catholic Volksverein directed its energy to an educational campaign, warning the people to be sparing and teaching them, through its voluminous literature, practical methods of economy. That a critical stage has not even yet been reached may be judged from the recent official announcement of the Minister of Agriculture, that there exists no reason for panic. Gauging the situation by the present distribution of flour and bread, he claims that there is not merely a sufficiency of food at hand for the future, but that a surplus will be left over for an emergency. It is admitted, however, that it will henceforth be necessary to prevent all waste and to increase home production to the utmost extent. In a recent publication, officially approved, the case is thus stated: "We are a people in the position of an individual who has heretofore had considerable income, and who learns, by a sudden misfortune, that with careful husbandry he can get along with much less." The following are some of the suggestions given:

> Meat consumption must be reduced, puddings, cheese and skimmed milk replacing it. The crops of beans, high in protein, should be increased and the number of pigs, which consume much food that man needs, reduced three and one-half millions or twelve per cent.; the number of cows, one million or ten per cent. Breadstuffs should not be fed to animals, nor should grain be used in manufacturing white starch or alcohol. The principal crops to be sown are beans, peas, potatoes, beets and seed corn. The Russian prisoners, mostly agricultural workers, must be employed on the 20,000 square kilometers of unused moorland. Cream and butter production is to be reduced. People will be healthier if they return to the comparative vegetarianism of their forefathers.

It is recommended that these and similar measures be carried out by new laws, careful administration and adequate instruction of the people. Maximum prices may be fixed where large consumption is desirable, and minimum prices where storage is preferable. It is certain that the Government will promptly take all necessary precautions.

Great Britain.—An important speech, which may be taken as voicing, in a measure, the views of the Government, was delivered at Bangor, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, David Lloyd George. The speaker noted with surprise that not even yet did the people of England seem to realize the seriousness of the struggle in which they were engaged. He warned his audience that while ultimate success was assured, the victory could not be won without a long struggle. It was within the power of the people to prolong the conflict by sloth and heedlessness, or by vigorous action to hasten the end. On the labor difficulties the Chancellor said:

The Chancellor's Speech

> It is intolerable that the lives of Britons should be imperilled for the sake of a farthing an hour. During war, Government should have the power of settling differences, so that the work shall go on. I do not believe the parties involved will refuse to comply with the urgent command of the Government that there should be no delay. Industrial differences are inevitable, but we can not afford them now.

Drink, said the Chancellor, was doing England more harm than any foreign enemy. It was not proposed to check this evil by the drastic measures employed in France and Russia, "still we have great powers to deal with the question, and we intend to use them in a spirit of moderation and wisely, but quite fearlessly."

Ireland.—Statements have been issued, on the authority of Mr. Redmond, that more than 200,000 Irishmen at home and in Great Britain have enlisted for the war. Mr. Arthur Griffith has cabled official statistics contradictory of these figures, and maintains that the recruiting efforts of the Irish party has failed. The recruiting lists given in the Irish papers are very meager, and the London Times accounts for the slackness in enlisting by the increasing demand for agricultural laborers. The fact that Carson's recruits have not yet gone to the front, that they are listed last in the new regiments, that their whereabouts is a mystery, is also given as a reason for indifference in Nationalist quarters. The suppression of a number of papers, the rigorous censorship of the remainder, and the establishment of martial law to deal with disloyal utterances, would suggest that there is not as much unanimity as is claimed officially. The Gaelic League seems to have maintained neutrality and to be thriving vigorously, and Irish trade has benefited by the war in many ways, especially in the reopening of the port of Queenstown. This was condemned before the war as unsafe, but a new Commission has found it eminently safe for the largest vessels. The danger of German submarines has made it necessary for the large Cunarders and warships to seek anchorage in Queenstown harbor.

Home Conditions

Mexico.—Reports from Mexico were never more alarming. Battles are of frequent occurrence; pestilence has broken out in many places and grim famine is abroad in the land. The national capital is in most desperate straits: many commercial and industrial houses have closed their doors; money issued by Villa, to the extent of some 50,000,000 pesos, has been nullified by Carranza; people are penniless, and there is no relief in sight. Carranza and his horde are living up to their base reputations. Their vindictiveness is worthy of untutored savages. General Obregon has sent more priests into exile because they could not give him money; as late as March 6 other priests were still in prison; this General frustrated the activities of an international relief committee and has threatened several times to evacuate the city and permit the unruly mob to solve their problems in their own wild way. Even the children have felt the "gentle" hand of Carranza; not long since he discharged the teachers of the Federal district, throwing 36,000 pupils out of school; he also sent adrift some 12,000 Government employees. Rule or ruin is his principle; ruin is the result. The American papers, long silent in a most sinister and inexplicable way on Mexican conditions, are beginning to open their columns to authentic reports. The March Metropolitan prints a temperate article, supported by references, from the pen of Colonel Roosevelt, and the conservative Boston Transcript recently gave place to a lengthy account of murder and rapine. Impartial witnesses agree in their estimate of the character of the two men, Carranza and Villa, who are the direct cause of Mexico's present misery. Our readers may draw their own conclusions from these words of Senator Fall of New Mexico:

When Carranza entered the City of Mexico, in the face of protests from foreign representatives and our own representatives he proceeded to punish without hesitation, by shooting to death, I am afraid to undertake to say how many of the more prominent citizens of that republic who remained within the city or whom he could seize in whatever quarter under his control, without trial. The so-called court-martial proceedings of either faction in Mexico consist in one man sitting in his office or at his desk or in his chair, or leaning up against the wall, and ordering a file of soldiers to go and arrest another man and shoot him. Man after man, delegates of the republic, senators, members of the standing committee on legislation, were shot down—assassinated. The police force was discharged; the courts were closed; the streets were paraded by soldiers, so-called, of the Carranza army; business houses were closed and the seals of foreign embassies placed upon them for their protection; and armed bands of rioters paraded the streets of the City of Mexico. That was the so-called Carranza Government.

Of Villa the Senator says:

I have denounced him before as a bandit without conscience, as a bloody murderer for hire, and I have known of him personally for years. When Mr. Villa went into the City of Mexico at the time Gutierrez went in as President, he visited a hotel in that city known as the Hotel Palacio. The proprietor of the hotel is a French reservist who had joined his colors and is now fighting for his country in France. . . . He left his wife, a young French woman, in charge of the hotel. I am not going into all of the details. I do not want, as I said, to arouse passion, but I want the people to be informed. Suffice it to say that Villa, with a file of soldiers, dragged that French woman from her home, took her screaming down the street in his automobile and kept her for four days—Villa himself, personally. That was no act of his irresponsible officers or vandals. These facts are verified.

Horrible as this is, it is surpassed in sheer brutality by crimes narrated in affidavits in possession of the editor of AMERICA. This further sketch of conditions from an unpublished affidavit may be of interest:

I repeat that never in any revolution has Mexico witnessed such barbarous excesses as in the present uprising and I speak as one having experience, for as a child I was present at the first revolution of reform headed by Comonfort. I saw the revolution against Maximilian . . . and indeed in none of these have I witnessed anything that could be likened to the present. . . . In the Republic of Mexico it is the current belief that this revolution has been fostered and helped with arms and money sent by Americans and furthermore that those leading this revolution have infamously deceived the President of the United States. If the President could only know what the Constitutionalists are actually doing in Mexico, if he could only see their work independent of any political movement—moved only by a purely humane motive, he would do his utmost to put a stop to this barbarous warfare. When asked what is to be expected from Carranza, he replied: Of Carranza we have to expect the same as of Villa, and from Villa the same as of Carranza and from both of these the same as from the devil!

It is understood that our Government has sent a sharp note to Carranza, deprecating in the severest manner the conduct of Obregon toward Mexico City, which is now isolated from the rest of the world. Should the Carranzistas leave the capital, no doubt Zapata will slip in again. What will then happen remains to be seen. The approximate number of foreigners in the city is as follows: Americans, 2,500; Germans, 1,800; Chinese, 2,000; Turks, 2,000; French, 1,900; Spaniards, 12,000; Cubans, 14,000; English, 1,000; Italians, 700; Japanese, 500; other nationalities, 800. Naturally the respective Governments of these people are much exercised over the gloomy outlook, and pressure is exerted on Carranza from all sides. So far the effect has been far from gratifying, and there is little reason to hope for anything better. Carranza is an intolerant demagogue wedded to a blind tyranny, which will always find expression in acts of oppressive violence and vindictiveness.

According to late despatches, Monterey has fallen into the hands of Carranza's army, and 2,000 troops have been sent by Gonzales to Monclova to assist Herrera, the Carranzista general. Fierce fighting is reported from Yucatan. The Constitutionalists are advancing on Merida, the State capital. These reports, however, are all from Carranza's news bureau.

Another Republic

Portugal.—The inevitable has happened in this little country. The republic founded on brutality and blood has split in two. For some weeks past trouble has been brewing; first the usual resignation of the Cabinet was announced, then came reports of riots in the streets of Lisbon, and now the press despatches announce that a congress of democrats, in session at Lamego, has set up the "Republic of Northern Portugal," with General Antonio Z. C. Barreto, a name suggesting Celtic ancestry, as President. There has been no harmony in the country since the King was dethroned. The Royalists clung to their old ideals, the religious-minded detested the impiety of the present régime, and the Radicals found the Government too moderate to suit their tastes. There has, too, been added dissatisfaction over the Government's attitude toward the European war; the storm which has been gathering has broken; just how violent the tempest will be it is hard to say. The situation, however, is grave; people are fleeing Lisbon, fearing riots; Socialists and Radicals have held meetings and promulgated decrees against the Government; townships have refused to obey orders sent out from Lisbon, and most significant, perhaps, of all is news that comes direct from the capital to the effect that the Republican Directory will convene to examine the text of the letter of resignation of the Portuguese Minister in Paris, who refuses to serve any longer under a dictatorship. A cruiser has been sent to Oporto, in view of possible riots at the funeral of Cardoso, whose assassin has committed suicide. Thus the Republic conceived in iniquity drags out a monstrous existence in sin, and the poor people pay the penalty.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Colossus of Terrorism

ON March 2 a callow youth, one of fifty or more distinct anarchist groups said to be in existence in New York, was caught placing a bomb in Saint Patrick's Cathedral. He belonged to the Circolo Gaetano Bresci, named after the assassin of King Humbert of Italy. The bomb was placed by him where he believed it would tear open the tombs of the two former archbishops of New York. Thus he meant to show his contempt alike for them and for the Church they represented. Such is the statement attributed to him, and it may be relied upon at least as an interpretation of the anarchist's point of view.

To understand perfectly any group of men we must understand the ideals that inspire them. These ideals will find their concrete expression in the heroes whom they honor. That the assassin Bresci's name was chosen by the circle to which the youthful criminal belonged is significant. More significant by far, however, is the worship bestowed by the united anarchist movement of the world upon another man, the founder of modern anarchism and the father of terrorism, Michael Bakounin. A year before the present event the centenary of his birth was celebrated at Webster Hall, in New York. "The great hall and gallery were packed," the Ferrer Association bulletin wrote, "with workers who assembled to pay tribute to this great man who gave his life to the cause of the oppressed." A glance at his doctrine may possibly convey an idea of the principles which, more or less, inspire the men who glory in being his followers.

Bakounin was possessed of one single idea: destruction. Constructive work of any kind in the cause of mankind or of the laboring classes themselves was to his mind the betrayal of the supreme purpose of the revolution. It "hinders pure destruction." To destruction alone the revolutionist's life must be vowed. In conjunction with Sergei Nechayeff, he thus expresses his concept of the true revolutionist:

> He has only one aim, one science, destruction. For that, and for nothing else, he studies mechanics, physics, chemistry, and sometimes medicine. With the same object he observes men, characters, the situations and all the conditions of the social order. He despises and detests existing morality. For him everything is moral that helps on the triumph of the revolution, everything is immoral and criminal that hinders it. Between him and society there is war—war to the death, incessant, irreconcilable. He ought to be ready to die, to endure tortures and with his own hands to kill all who place obstacles in the way of the revolution. (Revolutionary Catechism.)

A long series of revolutionary documents were produced by him in conjunction with Nechayeff, precisely as Marx and Engels collaborated in the formulation of the socialist theory. Robbery is idealized. The brigand is "the wrestler in life and death against all this civilization of officials, of nobles, of priests, and of the crown." Thus, in "Words Addressed to Students," Russian youths are exhorted to follow the example of the great brigand chief, Stenka Razin. Organized assassination is insisted upon and the "Propaganda of the Deed," later so clearly taught by the anarchist Kropotkin, is plainly formulated, though it is not given its distinctive name. In the passage, "Words have no value for us unless followed at once by action," is contained the germ of Kropotkin's principle: "A single deed makes more propaganda in a few days than a thousand pamphlets." It matters not what is destroyed, anything that stands in the way of revolution must go. "One deed begets another." The freedom of action given here may be judged from Bakounin's program for the International in his "Secret Statutes of the Alliance":

> We wish to destroy all States and all churches, with all their institutions and laws, religious, political, juridical, financial, magisterial, academical, economical and social, in order that all these millions of poor human beings, who are cheated, enslaved, overworked and exploited, may henceforth and forever breathe in absolute freedom, having been at last delivered from their masters and benefactors, whether official or officious, whether associations or individuals.

The Revolutionary Catechism divides the present "unclean society" into various classes. Of these some are to be destroyed instantly, others are to be granted life for the time being in order to drive people into revolt by their acts of oppression, still others are to be used as tools and thus compromised. Women are similarly divided into various categories. "The most valuable element are women who are completely initiated, and who accept our whole program. Without their aid we can effect nothing." Finally every effort must be made to intensify the existing miseries of society in order to drive men to desperation; for it must never be forgotten: "Our task is terrible, total, inexorable and universal destruction."

There is one cold ray of satirical humor in the events that mark the life of Bakounin himself. Bakounin's collaborator, Nechayeff, the very embodiment of every diabolic crime and immorality, finally applied Bakounin's principles to Bakounin himself, robbed him of all his documents and disappeared. For such a practical application of his own doctrine the old master was not prepared. He still approved of Nechayeff's purpose, but found the means used by him "detestable."

Though nothing less than the complete destruction of the present "filthy society" was premeditated by Bakounin in his writings, plottings and revolutionary activities in Russia, Bohemia, Prussia, France and Italy, and indeed in every thought and word of this Falstaffian revolutionary colossus, yet his rage may be said to have all been centered upon two objects, God and the State. The emancipation of the people could not be thought of until both had been destroyed. To abolish God and to annihilate every State throughout the world was the one supreme object his followers must ever keep in view. Over and over and over he continued to repeat the same thought until it became the one mad refrain of his speeches and writings: the Church and the Government must be destroyed everywhere and every way.

The idea of diabolical obsession is seldom so vividly suggested as in the case of Bakounin. He pretended to deny God, but passionately adored Satan. The contradiction implied in this condition of mind did not in the least perplex him. Satan was the one supreme ideal of every revolutionist, "the eternal rebel," as Hunter quotes the saying, "the first free-thinker and emancipator of the worlds." The revolutionary proletariat of Paris became for him "the modern Satan, the great rebel, vanquished, but not pacified." It was more important than all principles and programs "that the persons who put them into execution should have the devil in them." Such, in his "Secret Statutes," was his instruction to the International. "Although an avowed and militant atheist," we are told, "Bakounin could not subdue his worship of the king of devils, and had any one during his life said that Bakounin was not only a modern Satan incarnate, but the eight other devils as well, nothing could have delighted him more."

To return to the incident with which we began. Whom are we to blame: the youthful criminal, the Russian colossus of iniquity, or some other hidden cause? The answer is not hard to find. It is the smug teacher of our times, with a glib tongue dispensing rationalism and infidelity from our worshiped chairs of learning, and the so-called higher critics, destroying the foundations of Christian belief in popular schools of divinity, who prepare the way for the criminal. Here are the real criminals, whether they advert to it or not. It was the atheistic philosophy imbibed at the world's famous universities that formed both Marx and Bakounin, who were men of learning and refinement, versed in the sophisms of our materialistic schools. It is thence that godlessness is spread through all the classes of the people. In the wake of infidelity follow socialism and anarchism, as well as the destructive and oppressive liberalism of our wealthier classes. After these the deluge. Not education, but religion, is the one solution. Of this we need no better demonstration than that which is offered here.

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

A Marriage Trial

WHENEVER it is announced that the Church is about to pass, or has passed, judgment on the validity of a marriage, as happened lately in the case of Anna Gould, of New York, and Count Boni de Castellane, of Paris, people take scandal at her action and way of procedure. They pretend to see a contradiction between her doctrine regarding the indissolubility of marriage and her practice of holding such trials, falsely assuming that the aforesaid trials have for their object to decide whether a certain marriage is to stand or be dissolved. The doctrine of the Church, however, and her practice, far from being in opposition to each other, go hand in hand; and an unbiased critic can convince himself of this by examining dispassionately the Church's attitude.

First of all, in trials concerning Christian marriages already consummated, the Church never undertakes to decide whether a valid marriage should be annulled, but only whether there is sufficient ground for declaring that a certain marriage was never valid, but rather was null and void from the beginning, lacking one or more of the elements which the divine, or competent, positive law require as essential to a matrimonial contract. A concrete case, like that of Gould-Castellane, will make this point clearer. Anna Gould and Count Boni de Castellane were married in New York in March, 1895. After eleven years they separated; Anna Gould obtained from the civil court a sentence of divorce, and Count Boni, having lost all hope of resuming married life with the woman in question, entered his case in the Supreme Court of the Roman Rota for adjudication. Now, in applying to Rome, Count Boni did not ask that his marriage with Anna Gould might be annulled, but that it should be declared null and void from the beginning, and this on the plea that at the time of their wedding Miss Gould had not given that consent which is necessary for the validity of a Christian marriage. This has been the real subject of discussion in the three consecutive trials of this case, as may be seen from the way the three sentences have been formulated. The Church does not sit in judgment with the object of annulling marriages duly contracted, but only for the purpose of deciding whether a marriage was ever duly contracted. Moreover, as a rule, the Church takes up such cases only in answer to the call that her subjects, by her authority, have the right to make when they wish to have their freedom legally established. But to have that freedom established conclusively is not an easy task, as the Church, far from proceeding lightly in this matter, takes all possible necessary precautions in order to avoid passing a final sentence which might be unjust.

Thus the old rule in dubio standum est pro valore matrimonii (in case of doubt the validity of a marriage holds good) is held so sacred in matrimonial courts, that the judges can not in conscience pass a sentence in favor of the invalidity of a marriage, unless from the proofs offered it is truly evident to them that the marriage lacked some element necessary for its validity. In order to make it more difficult for the court to pass an erroneous judgment, Benedict XIV decreed that in every trial which deals with the validity of a marriage, an official called Defensor vinculi must take part. His duty is to defend the matrimonial bond, both by presenting whatever evidence he can gather in favor of the validity of the marriage in question, and by attacking the proofs which are brought forward against its validity. No session is valid unless he is present, or, at least, unless the acts of a session are submitted to him for inspection.

These regulations were not deemed sufficient in the eyes of the Church for safeguarding the indissolubility of marriage. Hence, it has been further decreed that in case either the first or second trial terminated in a sentence that declared a marriage invalid, as a rule, another trial in appeal must be held, in which the sentence already given against the marriage must be tested. The persons involved are not free to marry again before two different courts have each passed a sentence against the validity of the marriage. Even then they are not free, if, in spite of two such sentences, the Defensor vinculi feels bound in conscience to appeal again. This is partly illustrated by the case under consideration. After the first sentence had sustained the validity of the marriage, the second reversed the first and declared the marriage invalid; but the Defensor vinculi appealed against this second sentence and a third trial was held, in which, contrary to the judgment passed by the court in first appeal, the first sentence was confirmed.

The mention of all these regulations should be sufficient to show how anxious the Church is to protect the matrimonial bond. But are these regulations strictly observed? Here we must remember that the Church entrusts such cases to those judges only who from the standpoint both of honesty and learning are fully qualified for their office. In fact, the court to which a matrimonial case must be brought first is the court of the local Ordinary (Bishop or Metropolitan). If the first sentence is given by a Bishop, the case goes to the Metropolitan; if, however, it was given by an Archbishop, the case is then sent to the nearest Metropolitan. If a second appeal is necessary, the case is carried to the Roman Tribunal of the Rota. The Sacred Roman Rota is a college of most worthy ecclesiastics, vested with ordinary judicial power to settle cases which come in appeal to Rome. Bishops, therefore, Metropolitans, and the members of the Rota, are the judges to whom the Church entrusts the decision of matrimonial cases. As a rule, a case must have been tried first, at least once, by the local Ordinary before being brought to the Rota, but in particular cases it may be carried before the Rota immediately, if the Roman Pontiff so decrees—and this happened in the Gould-Castellane case. The Rota is a college of ten judges, but usually each trial is carried on by three only, and these, after having passed their sentence, are succeeded by three others for trial of the same case in appeal, and so on. Sometimes, however, a case is examined and decided by all the judges. This happened twice in the well-known case of Reid-Parkhurst. When Mary Reid appealed from the sentence that had sustained the validity of her marriage, all the judges of the Rota confirmed the first sentence and declared once more that the invalidity of her marriage had not been established. From this sentence her lawyers endeavored to enter a second appeal, but their appeal was not admitted by the Informant Judge, and the decision of the Informant Judge was sustained by a sentence which, this time also, was pronounced by the members of the Rota gathered in full session.

How conscientious the judges of the Rota are in fulfilling their delicate office may be seen by consulting the acts of that Roman court which are published regularly in the official pontifical bulletin, the Acta Apostolicae Sedis. The very case of Gould-Castellane is to the point.

The first sentence issued in this case was in favor of the validity of the marriage; that sentence declared that the invalidity had not been sufficiently established. The evidence supplied by Count Boni to prove the lack of the necessary consent on the part of Anna Gould at the time of their wedding was found to be insufficient and open to objections. At most, the evidence would have proved that Miss Gould had erroneously believed herself free to have her marriage dissolved in case Count Boni would have proved unfaithful to her, but it in no way proved that she intended to contract a marriage with the Count, on the condition that she would be free to have the marriage dissolved under the aforesaid circumstances. In other words, she may have erroneously thought her marriage dissoluble, but her intention was to contract a true Christian marriage. These were the facts. Now, in point of law it was argued that such an attitude of mind could not affect the validity of her marriage because her absolute and predominant intention was to contract a true Christian marriage.

The court in appeal reversed the first sentence. Having instituted further examinations, doubts were cleared and the testimony adduced by Castellane appeared to the judges to be above reproach and sufficient to prove that Miss Gould, besides erroneously believing that she was contracting a marriage, which under certain circumstances would leave her free, also intended to contract a marriage of this nature, and no other. Having these facts in view, it was argued in point of law that the intention to contract a marriage of this nature made the matrimonial contract null and void, because, according to Catholic doctrine, a marriage which is not absolutely indissoluble is not a valid marriage. In view of the evidence presented at this second examination, the judges who decided the case in appeal were surely warranted in giving the sentence as they did. They could not have given a different one. The disagreement between the first and second sentence should not surprise any person of good common sense, for everybody knows that in a second trial of the same case the evidence in favor of one or other of the two contending parties may receive additional strength. Besides, when the judges are different, it is not strange that the sentence also may differ without detriment to the reputation for honesty and sound judgment of either court.

The court in second appeal has just issued a sentence reversing the sentence passed by the court in first appeal and has again decided that there is not sufficient ground for declaring the invalidity of the marriage. Even if this last sentence were favorable to Count Boni's contention, there would not have been reason either for accusing the Rota of having been unjust to the lady involved, or for insinuating that the court was more anxious to please the noble and the rich than to follow the dictates of reason, and to conform its judgment to the requirements of law and right. But the very fact that this last sentence has been contrary to Count Boni's contention is, of itself, a refutation of any charge against the honesty of the Roman Court.

Final sentences, issued by the Roman Rota, declaring certain marriages invalid, are not wanting; but such sentences were issued irrespective of the economic and social standing of the interested parties. Peasants' marriages have been declared invalid. On the other hand, sentences which have repeatedly sustained the validity of marriages are not restricted to cases of poor persons, otherwise we would not find such cases as the Reid-Parkhurst, mentioned above, and the present case of Count Boni de Castellane. "The Wearing of the Green"

LONG before I became a Catholic, long before I dreamed that I should ever cross the sea and tread the streets of New York, the very name of its great Cathedral of St. Patrick seemed to have a significance above every other building in the world. The thought of St. Peter's at Rome, of St. Mark's at Venice, of the Cathedral of Milan, or of the Three Kings at Cologne, draws the mind to something that has sprung from a romantic past; but from a past that has flowed along more or less peacefully, changing with the ordered current of the passing centuries. St. Patrick's makes its appeal on quite different grounds: it is a building unique among all the buildings of the world. It is not wrapped around with a complacency adorned with the glamour of the ages; neither kings nor nobles are laid to rest within its aisles and chapels; nor do its archives tell of the benefactions of lords and counts such as many an ancient cathedral boasts, rather it is adorned with the nobility of labor and the gifts of love that labor wrested from the earth. But the appeal of St. Patrick's is that it is a voice crying out, and crying, can not be silenced. When the Home Rule Act was placed on the British Statute Book there uprose the slogan "Ireland a nation once more"—supposing Ireland to be synonymous with the Irish people. But St. Patrick's cries out not that Ireland is a nation once more, but that Ireland has never ceased to be a nation.

Deeper down than the foundations upon which the Cathedral's massy pillars and arches rest, more enduring than the living rock of Manhattan on which it is builded, is the sea of Irish blood poured out from the days of Henry Tudor who first sought to draw aside Ireland's faith, down to the blood of '98; and the persecutors, although it be without honor to their name, are the primal founders of St. Patrick's Cathedral. Ireland's young men were given to the sword, her daughters were turned homeless upon the highways, and her elders languished in prisons or died of starvation. And through the long, weary years, in secret places, in the dens and caverns of the mountains, by the lonely seashore or lake side, she kept the light burning, steadily and clear, so that the gusts of persecution scarce caused it even to flicker. Of the remnant, some few escaped to Europe and attained the honor denied them in the land of their birth, some crossed the seas to America, and with them they carried that for which they had resisted even unto blood, the Faith. This is what "the wearing of the green" in New York, and in all America, means on St. Patrick's Day, or it means nothing.

The bands are playing, there are processions and gatherings and marchings, and with the throng there marches, keeping step by step, a great company of shades. And yet not shades; but rather a multitude of witnesses, who, having passed through the baptism of blood, now march erect, clothed in white robes and holding palms in their hands. A throng whose joy is as the joy of those who triumph; whose silent passing can be heard above the tramping of countless feet, above the blare of trumpets, above the rattle of drums. Lips that once whitened with pain now echo an unending Alleluia; the arms once torn and shrivelled upon the rack-tree now are raised in benediction; the feet that trudged wearily through bog and swamp, that fled from the merciless pursuer, and at last took the path that led to the throne of the gibbet or the scaffold, now walk in heavenly places.

Such are the sons of St. Patrick, whose very march along New York's Fifth Avenue is a divine charade, masking eternal memories of faith and loyalty; whose every movement upon the seventeenth of March is an unfolding of the great deeds their sires performed in the days that are long past. The traffic policeman raises his hand to check the rush of oncoming vehicles, and in the days of persecution in Ireland his fathers offered their breasts as a living target for the swords and bayonets of the priest-hunting soldiery. When the crowd of worshipers, each wearing his little sprig of green, passes through the great doors into the Cathedral, their passing and their Cathedral are the Canaan which was bought when their fathers rotted in the prison dungeons of Ireland, starved on the roadside, and drained the cup of suffering to the last drops rather than betray the Faith which was St. Patrick's heritage to them. The priests who overflow the sanctuary like a living tide are the fruits of that harvest, reaped from the blood, the sighs and the tears of the multitude of priests who were hunted through Ireland like savage beasts, whose lives were of less value than the life of a sheep, who were outlawed as though they were robbers and felons, and through the bitter years preserved undimmed the sacred fire which

St. Patrick kindled. And when, raised high on his Metropolitan's throne, the Cardinal of New York, clothed in the shining scarlet of a Prince of the Church, blesses his children, it is but a consummation of that eleventh day of June in the year sixteen hundred and eighty-one, when the Venerable Oliver Plunket, Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of Ireland, after having been betrayed by suborned and lying informers and unjustly condemned to death, ascended the high scaffold at Tyburn, and before the eyes of London dyed the sacred purple with the purple of his own life blood. The holy body, maimed, mutilated, and disemboweled was sown as the seed of that great Church which was to spring up and flourish far across the Atlantic.

These are the sacred memories of which the "wearing of the green" is but a sign and a symbol. And in their train comes the vision of distant green fields and deep lakes, of bright moonlight glinting upon the white walls of thatched cottages, and the glow of the evening lamp through the red-curtained window panes; of the merry laughter of maids and young men and the sound of the fiddle as they follow their innocent amusement on the village green; of the chimes of the church bells, the measured beat of the waves as they break on the seashore, of the song of the thrush and the blackbird; of the sweet scent of the turf fire or the gentle perfume of the hawthorn. And when the vision has passed, and the hustling realities of twentieth century Manhattan chase away the days that have been, there yet remain the tiny spray of shamrock and the figure of St. Patrick standing high above the altar in his cathedral: the pledge and the token that Ireland has never ceased to be a nation.

Holland and the Holy See

AFTER the battle of Leipsic in 1813, when the Netherlands had been established as an independent State, its general Government at once entered into diplomatic relations with the Holy See. At that period the Pope's sovereignty was still generally recognized throughout Europe, while the separation of Church and State in Holland was not enacted till thirty-five years later, under the Constitution of '48. At first a chargé d'affaires carried on the diplomatic intercourse till, in 1827, a Dutch minister plenipotentiary was accredited at the Vatican. During his incumbency the terms of a Concordat between the two Governments were outlined, and in 1829 the Holy See erected an Apostolic Internunciature at The Hague to discuss the details of this document. Owing, however, to the political disturbance of 1830, which ultimately resulted in the separation of Belgium from the Netherlands, the Internuncio was recalled in 1831, and further negotiations were suspended by mutual agreement. During the interval between 1831 and 1841 the Papal Government continued to be represented at the Dutch Court by a chargé d'affairs. In the latter year another Internuncio arrived at The Hague, but repeated failures to arrive at a satisfactory solution of the existing difficulties caused him to take his departure shortly afterward. Seven years later the ad interim officiating chargé was again replaced, this time by the Internuncio, Mgr. Belgrado, during whose tenure of office the hierarchy was re-established in Holland, in 1853. Though some friction arose in connection with this far-reaching step on the part of the Holy See, nevertheless, in the same year, the Dutch Government sent a special envoy to Rome to acquaint the authorities there with the existing religious conditions of the country. As a result there was placed upon the statute book the present law regulating church corporations which, for one reason or other, has practically become a dead letter.

Though the Concordat was never ratified, nevertheless both Governments continued diplomatic relations with each other. Among the churchmen representing the Holy See at the Court of Holland since 1853 were Vecchiotti, Oreglia di San Stefano, Cattani and Bianchi. During Bianchi's term, while the Catholic Count Du Chastel was Ambassador at Rome, the final suppression of the Dutch embassy took place in November, 1871. The Liberals at the time controlled both branches of the national legislature and were still in the heyday of their power. In September of the previous year the Pope's temporal power had been overthrown by the Italian invasion of Rome. This gave the Liberals a welcome chance for moving the elimination from the foreign estimates of the annual expenditures for the support of the Papal embassy. By a scanty majority of six votes (39 to 33) the amendment was adopted. At this the Catholics of Holland naturally felt highly indignant; they publicly voiced their disapproval by a petition to the then reigning King, William III, that the embassy might be retained. Though close on to 400,000 signatures emphasized their appeal nothing came of it, and on February 4, 1872, Count Du Chastel was recalled. What caused Catholics additional chagrin was that it fell to the lot of one of their number, Baron Van Herwynen, then Secretary of Foreign Affairs in the Liberal Cabinet, to be charged with the execution of the decree. It is on record that this diplomat seemingly never recognized the propriety of resigning his office immediately. In spite of this unfriendly treatment at the hands of the Liberal Administration, the Holy See has ever since continued the Internunciature at The Hague and diplomatic intercourse with the Dutch Government has never been entirely suspended. Matters were permitted to follow their customary routine till May, 1899, when the Dutch Government at the suggestion of the Czar of Russia invited the nations of the world to the first Peace Conference at The Hague. Italy's refusal to agree to the admittance of the Pope's representative caused the latter to recall the Internuncio, leaving a chargé to attend to the business of the office. Queen Wilhelmina, it is reported, realized very acutely the unpleasant position in which Italy's petulant attitude thus placed her, and personally dispatched a friendly letter to the Holy Father to which His Holiness sent an immediate reply. Both these documents were read and recorded at the closing session of the Conference. Upon the death in 1902, of Mgr. Tarnassi the Holy See refrained from naming his successor, and up to 1911 a chargé d'affaires again filled the gap. During the latter year Mgr. Tacci, Papal Internuncio at Brussels, was likewise appointed to the Internunciature at The Hague, and in this manner the diplomatic relations between Holland and the Holy See are carried on at present. Meantime the Queen had done everything possible on her part to conciliate the Vatican and to smooth over the ruffled feelings of her Catholic subjects. Both in 1902 and 1908 Her Majesty sent a special embassy to Rome for the purpose of congratulating the Holy Father on the occasion of his two respective jubilees.

Part of the permanent platform adopted in 1896 by the Catholic group in the Dutch Parliament reads, "that the suppression of the Dutch embassy to the Holy See is strongly disapproved and deeply regretted by Catholics, and that both for the honor and the best interests of the country they do insist upon its restoration. Now that England deems it to her advantage to maintain an official representative at the Vatican, and since Turkey likewise is said to entertain a similar opinion, the Catholics of Holland decided to bring the question to the fore again. With an extra parliamentary Administration in power, it was thought that conditions looked quite favorable for obtaining redress of grievance on this point. Consequently in the Second Chamber Dr. Nolens, leader of the Catholic division, called the attention of the Cabinet to the subject, and Mr. London, head of the Foreign Office, courteously signified his willingness to consider the matter. A well-known author and publicist, Mr. Paul Goulmy, recently advocated, in a lengthy article in the Rotterdam Maasbode, speedy restoration of the Dutch embassy at the Vatican. Despite all this, however, the Government finally decided that action in so important an affair is momentarily inopportune. Thus the solution of the problem is once more deferred.

Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been sometimes amused and more often angered by the articles I read in Catholic periodicals regarding the "baneful" influence of the Y. M. C. A. on its Catholic members. The three strongest arguments against those of our faith joining the organization seem to be these: No Catholic can hold office; he gives bad example; he supports a Protestant enterprise. Now I am a graduate of a Jesuit college. I belong to the swimming team of the Y. M. C. A. in Philadelphia, and I have not yet lost my faith. Moreover out of the twelve members of the team, eight are Catholics, and so is the captain and the coach. Indeed there is not a club or society in the city to which I could go and meet so many of my Catholic friends. Nearly all the members of our church sodality are enrolled and a great number of Catholic college students. Therefore Catholics can hold office and it appears the only bad example they can give is by their healthy and robust appearance to inspire other Catholics to join an organization which will improve them physically. The head of the physical department told me personally, he is forbidden by the laws of the society to talk religion or to permit those under him to do so. Since I joined the Association, several years ago, I have heard no talk about religion except among the Catholics themselves. If you knew how much personal coaching and attention we receive in return for the small dues we pay you would see that the Y. M. C. A. supports us rather than we the Association.

Observe that I speak only of the athletic department of the Y. M. C. A. It is really the only place I can go for physical relaxation. There are three all-the-year swimming pools in this city. One is public and unfit for swimming; the second belongs to a German club and has a bar and the cleanest and best equipped is that of the Y. M. C. A.

Now let us examine the Catholic clubs in this city. There is the A. O. H. whose members must be of Irish descent. It has sick and death benefits and gives a yearly ball in a second-rate hall during which liquor is always served. Sufficiently exciting for an athletic fellow of twenty-five, isn't it? Then there is the I. C. B. U., a pool-room sort of a club with sick and death benefits attached. It is designed to provide its members with a financially solvent death rather than a longer, healthier life. Now take the K. of C.—More benefits living and dead; weekly inundations of tickets for amateur theatricals which are the despair and shame of the educated. Much good work is done, such as giving dinners to orphans and professorships to colleges. Though there are 100,000 Knights of Columbus in Philadelphia, not a single council owns a club house with a gymnasium or swimming pool attached.

Should not something be done for Catholic young men who are fond of athletics? We equip them with the finest education attainable; our colleges send out the pride of American manhood, virile and ambitious, mentally and morally capable of coping with the strongest. From the combat with the business world where shall they turn to refresh their tired bodies? Surplus energy too must be worked off and mental strain can only be cured by physical exertion. If our Catholic clubs and societies do not provide gymnasiums or swimming pools, where shall we go?

Philadelphia. LEO PAUL MCCLOSKEY.

THE foregoing letter was evidently sent to AMERICA as a sort of challenge. It suggested an inquiry into the condition it so aggressively defends. The New York Y. M. C. A. took a census of the religious affiliations of its members in 1912, which disclosed that, in the various branches in Manhattan and the Bronx, from 29.5 per cent. to 32.8 per cent. claimed to be Catholics. As the total membership of these branches at that time was upward of 17,000, it follows that there were then in these two boroughs alone about 5,000 Catholic young men and boys associated with the Y. M. C. A. There are more of them now, and conditions are probably the same in Philadelphia and other large cities throughout the country.

The Y. M. C. A. welcomes Catholics to its membership, it holds them eligible for all privileges in local branches, even for certain paid positions connected with athletic work; but against them it lays one restriction which goes to the very root of the matter: it refuses Catholic members the right to vote for the trustees who control the destinies of the Y. M. C. A., and, naturally, does not permit them to hold places on this board. Unitarians and Jews have the same privileges, and are placed under the same restrictions as Catholics. Thus eligibility for full membership in the Y. M. C. A. is determined by a religious test. Catholics are not excluded from this standing, as Unitarians and Jews are, upon the ground that they are not Christians, but on the ground that they are not Evangelical Protestants. Even if the Y. M. C. A. denied, which at least as far as its principal officers are concerned it does not, that it is a religious organization doing a religious work, these constitutional disabilities laid upon members not of the Evangelical Protestant sects would clearly establish its definite religious character.

The attitude of the Y. M. C. A. toward Catholics may fairly be expressed thus: "We are glad to have you join our association; we value the prestige that comes to us from having you increase our ranks; we appreciate the help we derive from the dues you pay; we enjoy having you use our swimming pools, gymnasiums, and libraries—in which last you will find no Catholic books or periodicals; we open to you even our Bible classes and prayer meetings, if you are disposed to use them;—but you must remember that this is a religious organization; that, because you do not belong to some Evangelical Protestant church, you do not pass our test; and, therefore, that we can not admit you to full membership."

A Catholic can not accept these terms without sacrificing loyalty and self-respect. If a man is to be denied essential privileges on the ground that he is not an Evangelical Protestant, it is not possible for him to accept other privileges which are granted only upon the understanding that for this purpose his religion shall be mutually ignored. Catholics can do this only when they fail to recognize, or refuse to admit, that the Y. M. C. A. is a religious organization, which restricts their membership upon religious grounds. Its ideals, its purposes, its methods, its resources, its zeal, its energy, its very life—all are drawn from the spirit of Evangelical Protestantism. No man in authority in the organization will deny it. Catholics should clearly understand that in the spirit which gives life to this association, no Catholic ever can have part. He remains a stranger in a strange land.

This correspondent, however, will probably condemn this view as being extremely narrow. He will deny that Catholics are made to feel like strangers, and will maintain that the Y. M. C. A. does not consider itself primarily a religious organization. A Catholic who does not feel like a stranger when discrimination is made against him on religious grounds, either has had the vision of his Faith distorted by the hypnotism of external hospitality, or else, for the sake of certain material benefits and pleasures, has deliberately paid the price in self-respect and loyalty. Moreover, the Y. M. C. A. does consider itself primarily a religious organization. It has gone into court in various parts of the country and claimed that its property should be exempt from taxation on the ground that it is a religious organization doing a religious work. While it is true that the association has also maintained in court that it is an educational organization, it has done so only after the court has denied it the religious status it demanded at first. In its effort to establish itself upon the reservation at West Point, the association reversed its usual proceedure and claimed to be an educational society, because admission would not have been granted to a distinctly religious organization. The Y. M. C. A. was at first exclusively, and it remains now chiefly, an organization which aims, by various attractive means, to bring young men under the influence of the Evangelical Protestant religion. This principle will be admitted by officers of the association when the question is put to them squarely. It is affirmed in their constitution when it gives voting power only to Protestant members; and it is denied, or glossed over, only by overzealous workers who wish to banish religious scruples in the hesitating prospective member, or by Catholic associates who wish to justify themselves in accepting favors from one hand of an association which, with the other, penalizes them for being Catholics.

To the young man who takes delight in gymnasiums and swimming-pools, this may seem a somewhat abstract and academic question, for he finds it in his heart to reply that, as far as the Catholic member is concerned, the primarily religious character of the association lies beyond his field of consciousness, and that concretely and actually the Catholic is never bothered by any attempt at direct proselyting. This position is the last ditch of defence. After all it were better that Catholic members should be subject to direct proselyting, than that they should be constantly under an influence, not recognized for the thing it is, yet inevitably inimical to their religion. A direct attack upon their faith would rouse their dormant loyalty and self-respect, and drive them out of the association; but so long as they can not or will not recognize that by association with the Y. M. C. A. they are making concessions and submitting themselves to influences dangerous to their faith, they find, like our correspondent, sufficient grounds for defending themselves after they have assumed a position which is untenable and dangerous.

Opposition to his faith will set a Catholic upon his guard, and impel him to avoid occasions that are dangerous to it. The greatest danger to the religious faith of a Catholic is that spirit of religious liberalism which holds that one religion is as good as another, for it destroys positive, saving faith in any religious belief. In a world saturated with materialism it is extremely easy, though extremely illogical, for a young man to argue that, if one religion is as good as another, one religion is as bad as another, and from this, when the fit is on him, he can without much difficulty assume the position that there is no good in any religion at all. Yet it is only by a practical application of this dangerous principle that it is possible for the religious services of an institution which outwardly appears to be a young men's club to be made "broad" enough to take in, as they are intended to do, members of all shades of belief and unbelief. Moreover, it is only upon an affirmation of this principle that the Y. M. C. A. can find any grounds for appealing to Catholics to disregard religious differences and become members, though at the same time it denies this principle and actually asserts that one religion is not as good as another when it refuses to give Catholics a vote because they are not Protestants. Yet the denial of this principle is to be preferred to the affirmation of it. For, in denying that one religion is as good as another, the Y. M. C. A. simply places Catholics under a stigma in an association they never should have joined, but in affirming the principle as a means of doing its own kind of religious work, the Y. M. C. A. is creating an atmosphere which subjects Catholic members, and all others who have definite religious belief, to an insidious process of attrition by which their faith is in danger of destruction.

The Catholic Church regards her young men as the flower of her flock. She rejoices to see in them that Catholic instinct, that jealousy of Catholic honor which is the surest safeguard of their faith. She looks very wistfully to find in them that spirit which makes them prompt to answer her call for service in the Catholic cause. This instinct and this spirit can not be developed and fostered in the atmosphere of the Y. M. C. A. The Church does not expect a Catholic young man to take the stand, and to use the arguments to which this correspondent has given expression in his letter. Such a letter is certainly not the fruit of the training received in a Jesuit college. It is the natural result of several years' association with the Y. M. C. A.

"Where is the Catholic young man to go?" There lurks a measure of reproach in the very asking of that question. Are our young men weary of waiting for their gymnasiums and swimming-pools? Are they now willing to purchase these pleasures at the sacrifice of a principle for which their fathers and forefathers gave the last full measure of devotion? They should remember that Catholic resources of energy and money have been constantly expended in building and maintaining churches, parish schools and colleges by which means Catholic young men of to-day have received the Faith, and have been equipped, as this correspondent claims, with the best education obtainable. Is the Church to be reproached by her own sons because she can not do more for them now? Perhaps some day, not so remote that "an athletic young fellow of twenty-five" may not live to see it and share in its labors, there will arise all over our country club-houses for Catholic young men, modeled, at least architecturally, on the best examples of the Y. M. C. A. But if that day ever comes, it must come as the result of the zeal and the service of Catholic laymen. When Catholic young men—especially those who have had the advantage of a college education—cease demanding of the Church service she has not the means to render; when, seeing her need, they no longer turn their backs upon her to accept bounty from the hands of strangers; but, with hearts full of Catholic devotion and loyalty and zeal, say to her, not, "Serve me!" but, "I will serve thee!" it will be very easy to answer the question: "Where shall our Catholic young men go?"

COMMUNICATIONS

Regulating the "Foundations"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I fear Mr. Mitchell read into my words more than they contained.

What I wanted to convey was the idea that our Government was quite strong enough to deal with these Foundations in the light of their acts and that unless these acts infringed the law or contravened public policy the Foundations themselves could hardly be considered as the "menace" or "peril" to our institutions that Mr. Walsh seemed to think they were.

I offered no suggestion as to the "breaking of strikes" being either good or bad; all I said was that the use of money to break strikes was not now unlawful nor was it likely to be unlawful in the future. If the Foundations use unlawful means, such as Mr. Mitchell describes, the law can be invoked to restrain them or punish them, can it not?

I quite agree with Mr. Mitchell's remark as to the desirability of a united effort by all to remove the causes of industrial unrest. I may perhaps be allowed to suggest that the work of the Industrial Relations Commission might be a little more fruitful of good results if the Chairman were a trifle less violently partisan.

A Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am keenly interested in the Catholic daily discussion and I hope that something crystallizes out of it all. Our minds, now convinced of its need and advantage, should be bent on ways and means of starting it. Can we get no wealthy Catholic nor any body of wealthy Catholics to risk the venture? To buy a daily in one of our large cities and to run it, not as a professedly Catholic paper, but in such a way as not to offend our Catholic faith and morals, would seem to me to be the safest kind of a business risk. In the first place, the paper would in all likelihood retain its original circulation; then, with the approval of the hierarchy, clergy, Catholic leaders and Catholic societies, there is no reason why this paper, especially in cities like New York, Boston, Chicago or St. Louis, should not in a short time, under proper business management, become the largest daily in the city. Moreover, a daily, healthy in sane principles, "sensational," too, but not with the morbid sensationalism of immorality, would appeal, I am sure, to numerous healthy-minded parents outside the fold who wish to have in their homes a paper not dangerous to the innocence of their children. It is easy to predict for the wealthy Catholic who puts this work on its feet great financial success, and to forecast that within a decade or two we may have great dailies in all our large cities. Will the Hearst for the Catholic daily please step forward? Or will some one please find him for us?

St. Louis. A READER.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The contributions to AMERICA on this subject have been interesting though of varying value. The most complete, and I think the most valuable, after the opening article of Dr. Flick, was the well-considered statement, evidently founded on experience, of Mr. Michael Williams. But there are other journalists whose experience lead them in some respects to opposite conclusions. Admitting the necessity of a Catholic daily, Mr. Williams is convinced that such a journal, which can not cater to the passions of the public, has no chance of financial success until a sufficient number of readers have been inoculated with a taste for decent and honest journalism; and therefore that a sure foundation, namely plenty of money to start with, is the prime necessity. The present writer has had long experience on both secular and religious papers, and he has come to the conclusion that money is not the prime necessity, and that the public are not only not so given to sensationalism that they will disrelish what is sane, wholesome and true, but that the latter is the very thing they are thirsting for.

Take the daily papers of New York City to-day. Who knows better than the journalist that in them real news and honest news is never to be counted on, that such is an exception rather than the rule, and that a large proportion, probably the vast majority, of their readers are aware that the pabulum fed them is largely made up of adulterated or unadulterated lies. Such readers, and recent experience has multiplied their numbers and their yearning, are ripe for a paper that will tell the truth, give real news in due proportion, and express sound, or at any rate honest, opinions on every subject of importance, unswayed by advertisers, monopolists, politicians, or any other external influences.

I was talking recently on this subject with an experienced journalist who owns a very successful Eastern paper, which is also distinguished by its rather unusual respectability. He is a Catholic who is stronger in faith than in practice, but he became greatly interested in AMERICA when it was first shown to him about two months ago. Analyzing carefully every part of it, he said it approached the ideal more nearly than any other American publication. He pointed out some editorials which were so frank and true that no metropolitan daily would dare publish them. The Chronicle he considered a model in compression, clearness and impartiality. There was more real news in it than in the seven daily issues of—and he named five leading New York dailies. The departments covered everything, and each was well done. In its 26,000 words there were few that were superfluous. Now, he said, get out a daily in that fashion, with the requisite adaptations, and you will have a paper that will give a vast number of people what they are consciously or unconsciously longing for, and will surprise them and others by its delicious novelty.

For the majority of readers are not so hungry for sensational and scandalous and yellow-colored news as editors seem to think. One proof of this is that since editors began to paint their pages yellow they have to depend on the advertisers, not the readers, for financial support, and frequently failing in this, have to draw on the inexhaustible millions of their monopolistic owners. Their contents have cheapened with their prices. Glaring headlines and melodramatic scandals bore, with the result that the average reader turns over to the sporting page or some matter of business interest. Their columns, home and foreign, consist largely not of news but of the offal of news; and much of it is evidently manufactured in the offices. Their editorials are flimsy, arbitrary, contradictory, brazenly asserting or denying to-day what they denied or asserted a week or a month ago, anything but the consistent expression of sound and considered views on the questions of the hour. They do not express their mind, for they have no mind to express. That belongs to their owners or their advertisers, and these have their minds focussed only on their own interests, which are not the interests of the public. Now AMERICA knows its own mind and has the ability and the courage to express it. It has also a sound estimate of what is news and what is not, and has the courage to include the one and exclude the other. A daily paper so conducted, always with the requisite adaptations, would be a long felt want that would capture the public by its very novelty.

But the adaptations required would be considerable. In the first place it should not be called, nor be in any formal sense, a Catholic daily. What we want is a paper, established within daily reach of every district in the United States, that will give honest news and honest views in readable fashion. Get together three or four Catholic men of journalistic experience, of wide information and sound Catholic instincts, who know their own minds and will be swayed by no influence from expressing them, and you have the essentials for the success of a great and good American paper. A large number of Americans of all denominations, vastly larger than surface observers take thought of, are yearning for just that kind of paper. They won't quarrel about its political views, national or international, provided they are normally non-partisan and always honest; and whatever its views, they will be satisfied if its news, home and foreign, is as true as is fairly ascertainable, and proportioned according to decency and value. There is a growing revolt against the unreliability, the partisanship, the lack of principle, the catering to indecency and to moneyed interests, of the average daily; and this is the moment for an honestly independent and able paper.

It is men, not money, that will make such a paper. Some of your correspondents seem to think that money is the whole question. On the contrary, it is almost negligible. I know one man who is anxious to turn over unconditionally $1,500,000 to such a paper the moment he is assured that it has intrinsically a fair guarantee of success; and he understands by success the right kind of men at the helm. Given the men who have the requisite Catholic character and literary power and possess, or know how to supply, the supplementary business qualities essential to financial success, all the money needed will be easily obtainable. Convince even ten bishops that an enterprise, so manned and planned, lacks but financial backing for the launching and, as far as finance is concerned, it could be launched in a month.

The details of control and theological advice could be easily worked out. Briefly, a daily paper that would meet Catholic needs should also meet the needs of all decent Americans and, having to deal largely with secular affairs in secular fashion, should be run by laymen. Instances would occur where philosophical and theological and other expert advice would be needed, and should be had and hearkened to; but ordinarily it would be a layman's paper. The editors and managers, being Catholic, its tone would be fundamentally and unconsciously Catholic, and when the occasion occurred, which would be comparatively infrequent, it would take frankly the Catholic attitude on morals and dogma and historical and literary interpretation.

It would do all this, and be at the same time the independent expression of the editors' minds and purposes, taking from them its life, color, character and distinctive individuality. Hence it would be inadvisable to take over any of the existing secular dailies, all of which have traditions more or less objectionable. It will have to be its own ancestor.

Such a paper would live and vitalize immeasurably Catholic thought and activities; and last, but least, it would pay.

Palm Beach, Fla. MICHAEL MCDERMOT.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

May I through your columns say a word in defence of Catholic laymen? Among your correspondents—particularly those who are writing about the Catholic press—it has become, it seems to me, quite popular to blame the Catholic layman for all our troubles. These writers take particular delight in alleging that the Catholic layman is unwilling to stand up and be counted a Catholic, that he will not get out and fight for his Faith, that he will not support his fellow Catholics in their various efforts, that he will not generously respond to the calls made on him by various Catholic institutions. Personally, I have met but few Catholics who, when the occasion demanded that they do so, failed to make their Catholicism known. The only ones I have ever met who failed when tried were Catholic politicians who were Catholics—and then very loud ones—only when they felt that it meant votes for them. Thank Heaven, I have known only a few of them.

The churches, the schools, the colleges, the hospitals, the asylums and other institutions built and maintained by Catholics seem to me to speak very eloquently not only of the industry and self-sacrifice of our good priests and nuns, but as well of the generosity and self-sacrifice of our laymen.

If the average Catholic weekly newspaper is not what we would like it to be—and I believe that "A Perfect Fool" (who is by the way not so much of a fool after all) is more nearly correct in his estimate of these publications than is Father Corbett—the blame is to be ascribed to the managers and editors of these publications rather than to the Catholic public.

We do not to-day need a Catholic daily. Even an endowed daily such as Mr. Williams describes would prove a failure. I question, moreover, if a sufficiently large endowment could be raised for such a publication. We do not need an endowed diocesan weekly. But we do need a number of real Catholic diocesan weekly newspapers, newspapers which will publish the news of the dioceses in which they are published. Most of our Catholic weeklies attempt to cover too much territory, and so spread themselves out too thin.

In the homes of many good Catholics the diocesan weekly is never taken out of the wrapper in which it was mailed. Why? Because the paper does not publish the news of the diocese—the news in which the subscriber is particularly interested. The other day I obtained one of the best of these weeklies, published in a great archdiocese. Out of nearly forty-seven column-inches on the first page, just exactly three column-inches were given over to news of the diocese. I found the diocesan news on the fifth page. Out of forty-one columns of reading matter in that issue, there were four columns of editorials, none of them about anything very near home, twenty-seven columns of general news, and about ten columns of the news of the diocese. The general treatment of the local news indicated that the editors felt that it was of but little, if any, importance. A few Sundays ago, I heard a priest refer to the intended visit to the parish of the subscription representative of the diocesan weekly. He very frankly admitted that the publication was not what it ought to be, but urged the people of the parish to subscribe for it in the hope that it would be improved. Finally he said that it was the duty of the parishioners to support the weekly, but it seemed to me that he felt that it was an unpleasant duty. The sheet for which he so openly apologized was one which Father Corbett said did honor to its editor. That diocese should have a publication for which no one need apologize. If the editors will give us Catholic weekly newspapers that are interesting and readable, the Catholic public will in return, if properly approached, give a willing and generous support. With the right sort of circulation, both as to quantity and quality, that such a publication should have, it would be no difficult matter to obtain desirable and profitable advertising. From such a publication, a Catholic daily can reasonably be expected to develop.

The Purchase of Alaska

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Here is an item of information which is not generally known and which you may wish to make use of in your paper. George Hazzard, of Tacoma, who visited Juneau some time since, made the statement that Abraham Lincoln's great Secretary of State, William H. Seward, conceived the idea of buying Alaska from Russia seven years before the purchase was actually consummated, and that his attention was first called to the idea by a Jesuit, a member of an Order that has contributed greatly to the civilization of this Territory.

> It was in 1860 at the Merchants' Hotel in St. Paul that Colonel Allen, proprietor of the hotel at the time and for many years afterward, introduced William H. Seward to a Jesuit priest. The introduction was made just before Mr. Seward was to address a meeting during his campaigning tour in the interest of the presidential candidacy of Abraham Lincoln.
> Seward became so interested in the marvelous story of the Jesuit missionary that he was late at the meeting and had to be reminded that he was expected to address a large assemblage that was anxiously awaiting his appearance. Seward went to the meeting and with the priest's story fresh in his mind, predicted that the United States would purchase "Russian America" and cause its development into a great section of the Republic. Mr. Seward lived to negotiate the purchase himself and to visit the place. That he was well pleased with the work accomplished is testified to by the circumstance that shortly before his death he wrote that the greatest act of his life was the purchase of Alaska, and the second greatest act was the attestation as Secretary of State of the Emancipation Proclamation issued by Abraham Lincoln.

This, I think, is a piece of news that will give pleasure to many of your readers.

"The Enemy of the Poor"?

ALMOST amazing statement was made by a criminal when questioned by the police as to the motive that had induced him to attempt to set off a bomb in the Catholic Cathedral of New York. He is reported to have said that he hated the Church because he believed it was the enemy of the poor. There have been many charges brought against the Church, but this last calumny is the most gratuitous of all. The very contrary has been the standing reproach that non-Catholics have always been ready to fling in the face of the Church. Her devotion to the poor Italians of New York City in particular has kept more than one possible convert out of her ranks.

A prominent man in the city with strong leanings toward Catholicism, but with very pronounced repugnances against the sacrifices involved in "going over to Rome," has made it his practice for years, whenever his Romeward tendencies became too insistent, to attend services in the Italians' Catholic church. The sight of the poverty of his prospective coreligionists and the character of the art with which the pastor had catered to the tastes of his poor congregation were very effective antidotes for his passing fervor. He found he went back to his fashionable and exclusive congregation quite cured. He could sit among the rich, if not altogether at peace, at least, without a shock to his esthetic sensibilities, for there was nothing about the fellow-worshipers who frequented the chapel he attended that could offend his artistic and aristocratic soul.

In no Catholic church in the world could he have the same security. Since the days of Christ there has been one clear, cogent mark of the Catholic's place of worship. In it the poor had the Gospel preached to them. In every quarter of the globe her devotion to the poor has been a clamorous proof of her divinity. And now from that same poor Italian church, a church that is eminently the church of the poorest of the poor, to the sacred edifice that is known the world over as the Cathedral of the poor, there comes an Italian anarchist with a bomb in his hand, because, forsooth, he believes that the Church hates the poor. A startling piece of psychology, surely! There is strange persuasiveness in the anarchistic eloquence that can tell men, and make them believe, that black is white.

Bread for the Needy

THERE is a beautiful story told in Holy Writ of a great throng, some five thousand strong, not counting women and children, whom Our Lord found fasting on the northeastern shore of the Lake of Galilee, and whom He fed in the midst of the wilderness with bread of His own divine making. He did not form them into a line, but this was because of the exquisite delicacy of His kindness. He did not bid them stand shivering, confessed to the world as beggars, to receive His beneficence from the hands of servants. He made them sit down, friends and acquaintances together, and then He and His disciples ministered to them with their own hands. They were His guests, they were invited to His feast; not for a moment did they think they were the objects of charity. This is the beginning of our modern charity, or, at least, of the best of the spirit that animates it.

Pagan Rome threw bread to her citizens, but she did so in disdain, contempt and fear, lest the rabble should rise in revolt and extort it by force. The motive of our gifts to the poor is far different: it is Christian. It is imbued, at least for the most part, with the spirit of Him who is the first of many brethren. It springs, though this is not always appreciated, from fellowship with Jesus Christ. Perhaps this is not realized even by Catholics as fully as it should be. Honor to whom honor is due. No one doubts the generosity that has prompted the sending of ships laden with food to the hungry across the seas. Every one applauds the sympathy that doles out the loaves to the unemployed in our own cities. But the breaking of bread to the multitudes, lest they faint by the way, did not originate yesterday nor the day before, it goes back to the time of Christ. Like many another work of mercy, it had its inception in the Sacred Heart of the Saviour.

Is It Merely Folly?

COMMENTING on the plea recently made in favor of the liceity of putting to death the old and those incurably ill, one of our leading dailies combated the proposition on the ground that it is against common sense. The position thus adopted is correct as far as it goes, but it illustrates the unchristian character of our public press. We used to be told that murder was wrong because it is forbidden by the divine law, both natural and positive. The Fifth Commandment of God was put before us as the final and unalterable expression of the Sovereign Master's will with regard to the life of His human creatures. Our life, so we were taught, was a sacred thing of which no individual might deprive us, save in the single case of unjust aggression against which the taking of our life was the only means of self-defence. Murder was declared to be an unholy violation of two rights: the inalienable right inherent in every man to live all the days and years of his divinely appointed term of existence, and the absolute right of the Creator to be served by the creature of His hands until He Himself in His own inscrutable designs had given death permission to supervene. An awful and eternal sanction was held up before all as a warning against any infringement, no matter on what provocation, of either of these rights. God was a jealous God, who would exact a terrible retribution. This was in the past the custom of all writers. Such teaching now seems to be regarded as old-fashioned. The new learning has provided a substitute for it in the form of the dictate of common sense, a substitute that is hopelessly inadequate, as the writer of the editorial in question knows perfectly well. Can it be that the reading public has grown so far away from God, that even the most obvious of His prerogatives can not be vindicated?

Compromising

A CORRESPONDENT has sent us an evening paper of Wilmington, Del., containing an account of a building fund campaign launched by the Santa Maria Council of the Knights of Columbus of that city, whereat the speaker is reported to have expressed himself thus:

> No one who has considered it can doubt the usefulness of fraternal organizations when they are based on good principles and possess a membership of upright and worthy gentlemen. Such an organization not only promotes the welfare of every member of it, but it helps to improve and lift up the whole community. We all recognize that in this country the Masonic craft has promoted upright living in the community and has benefited personally the men who belong to it. Similar good things may be said of other fraternal organizations, such as the Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias and the Improved Order of Red Men.

Now, we do not "all recognize that the Masonic Craft," nor its Odd Fellow and Pythian cousinship, "has promoted upright living in the community," however much it "has benefited personally the men who belong to it," which is quite a different thing. The moral system of Masonry, as explained by Albert Pike, the supreme authority, is largely in character and wholly in motive, the antithesis of Christian morality. Nor does experience show that Masonry as such has uplifted any man's morality. But the implication in the speech of the Wilmington Knights' speaker that Masonry and its kindred societies are "based on good principles" is a more serious matter. The Roman Pontiffs for two hundred years have condemned Masonry precisely because it is founded on false principles subversive of Christian Faith and morality. Pope Leo XIII specifically condemned not only Freemasonry, but two of the other societies lauded by the spokesman of Wilmington. Pope Pius X made the "Battle against Freemasonry" the prayerful purpose of every Catholic and, in reply, Masonry's Sovereign Grand Commander at Washington called upon all American Masons of every rite to unite with all Protestant Americans against the purposes of Rome. The Knights of Columbus were instituted mainly to carry out these purposes, and they are doing it well. The speech at Wilmington was contradictory both of their principles and of the solemn declarations of the Church they guarantee to support and defend. The speaker's further declaration that the recent attacks on the Knights of Columbus are as false as the charges brought against Masonry in the anti-Masonic agitation was equally unjust to his Order. The oaths and charges of Masonry as published by John Quincy Adams and others were not, and can not be, repudiated. To put the bogus Knights of Columbus oath on the same level with them is to authenticate that document.

There have been other recent attempts to conciliate Masonry. They are all equally futile; even when not made at the expense of truth. As the American Freemason frankly admits, there is an essential antagonism between Freemasonry and the Catholic Church. The organs of Masonry teem with this antagonism, and their enmity is growing precisely as our numbers grow. It is true that a large number of American Masons do not share it, for reasons previously stated in AMERICA, but the Order, as such, is irreconcilable to the Church. Catholics should show charity to individual Masons, whether friendly or hostile, as to all other men; but they can have no more sympathy with Masonry itself than with any other false system. Charity is patient and kind and all-embracing, but does not compromise with principles.

A Distressing Situation

SOCIALISM is meeting with many disenchantments in the present war. What is apparently causing the greatest anxiety to a German socialist, in the Freiburg Volkswacht, is the general reawakening of interest in religion. While the comrades are fighting at the front their wives, he laments, are manifesting a piety at home which is becoming truly disquieting. "They run to church, not only twice on Sundays, but attend early Mass on weekdays, and are present at rosary devotion every evening." Such unexpected developments, he says, could never have been even dreamed of before by those who had previously known these women. "They are thus proving untrue to their husbands with whom they have shared suffering and joy, and will share them again, if fate so decrees."

This distressing condition of affairs might indeed suggest serious consequences. But apparently there is little danger that conjugal felicity will suffer because of it, even should the husbands return safe from the field. We may gather this from the subsequent warning addressed to the men themselves. It is true that the Volkswachi writer does not find fault with all the comrades: only with some whose sad decadence has evidently come under his notice. "It is no great glory that a man who went to the front three months ago, a determined rationalist, should now write letters home which are simply unctuous with piety. It matters not whether they are directed to the priest or to his own people, for these missives can be used by the priest in the interests of his Church, and held up to the people as model letters." Things, indeed, have come to a pretty pass! The German socialists deserve our tenderest commiseration.

Our New Statistics

THE 1915 edition of the "Official Catholic Directory" of the United States, published by P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York, is as rich as usual in interesting statistics, which indicate the Church's steady progress. The Catholics in this country now number 16,309,310, an increase of 241,325 since last year, and a gain of nearly 4,000,000 over the figures of 1905. It is the amiable custom of Dr. Carroll to deduct fifteen per cent. from our numbers to allow for the infants who, in his opinion, are not yet Catholics. For he has decreed that it is not Baptism, but some other Sacrament—Matrimony, possibly, or Extreme Unction—that admits a person into the Church. But Mr. Joseph H. Meier, the compiler of the "Catholic Directory," maintains that our grand total of 16,309,310 is really a conservative estimate. Ten per cent. should be added to represent the "floating" Catholic population, of which no record is kept.

Other statistics of special interest given by the "Catholic Directory" are these: The priests of the United States fall but six short of 19,000, of whom 4,986 belong to Orders and Congregations; three hundred and ten churches have been established during the past year, making 14,961 altogether; there are 6,770 young men preparing for the priesthood in our eighty-five seminaries; 229 boys' colleges are maintained, 680 girls' academies, 284 asylums housing 45,742 orphans; and 5,488 parishes are provided with parochial schools, which are attended by 1,456,206 children for whose education the State does not pay a single dollar.

The United States census places the Catholic population of the country at 12,000,000, and asserts that in nineteen of the forty-eight States a majority of the people professing religious belief are Catholics. The compiler of the "Catholic Directory" makes no comparisons, but names thirty "banner States" with large Catholic populations, New York leading, with nearly 3,000,000. Pennsylvania, Illinois and Massachusetts have about a million and a half each. After perusing the foregoing statistics this thought will doubtless occur to the reader: If each and every one of those 16,309,310 children of the Church were always practical and consistent Catholics, what a strong bulwark they would be of all that is best in American civilization!

If I Were You

PUT yourself in his place. It is a healthy and holy exercise. You will find it harder than you imagine. You must be willing to leave the contented home in which you now live and go into a strange land. You are satisfied with your own views of things. You might like to have another's lungs, liver or digestive apparatus, but what of an exchange of your likes and dislikes for his? They are the chains which hold in check many a man who has an idea of faring forth from his own place and occupying another's. Then, again, you will be going to a place where a foreign language is spoken when you endeavor to put yourself in his place. A red flag is a red flag in the dictionary, but it does not mean the same to a bull and a bullfrog. It is a challenge to the one and a charm to the other. In the dictionaries of the soul, where definitions have been made by life and experience, no two words mean the same. Home is translated heaven by you, but home may be translated otherwise in his place. Philosophers have held that no two angels are alike. You will appreciate that truth when you try to get into his place. In the sum total of all they have experienced and are, no two souls are alike.

You begin to see why putting oneself in another's place is not a popular form of amusement. Great actors give a lifetime to the study of some dramatic character which they are to impersonate. Not all are complete successes at such interpretations. Insight is lacking or sufficient sympathy or adaptability. "How can we get papa out of that little hole?" inquired a child anxiously of her mother, on hearing her father over the telephone. It is the opposite problem which confronts you when you try to put yourself into another's place. How can I get into that hole? And in a true sense you never can. The insistent tide pushes its way into bays and creeks and recesses; the air presses down on the world and fills every nook and cranny; ether with more imperious pressure goes where water and air can not go and swathes and permeates the universe, but however close all these widespread elements come to what they engulf, they have yet only put themselves around or near another's place, not in it.

"If I were you," says old wisdom to young ardor. "But you are not," replies young ardor, "and you never can be because you have forgotten what you were at my age." "If I were you," says the teacher to the pupil. "But you are not and can not be," replies the pupil. "You had dreams once of what you would say and do to pupils when you were a pupil and had at the time an unsympathetic, isolated and insulated teacher. You failed to note down your grand program for the amelioration of the tutorial department of life, and now it is too late. You have gone far away from his place and do not know the way back. And you really don't want to come back or recall what you would now term the callow, utopian dreams of unsophisticated experience." Alas!

That it should be so! We often say, "If I were you," but we mean, "If you were I." Selfishness, prejudices, antipathies of all kinds, national jealousies, professional jealousies, family jealousies, these and a hundred other busy agents, are at work intrenching themselves with barriers never dreamt of in the most deadly and ingenious warfare. You are you and I am I, and a lifetime of siege can not carry either impregnable fortress.

The supposition, "If I were you," is incapable of full realization and often has an echo or undertone of arrogance. "If you were I," is a better supposition, because you know fairly well your place, and you know what you would like others to say and do to you. Act towards others as though they were another you, and you will find that you and they differ, indeed, as the angels are said to do, yet you will discover, too, that both you and they, with all your idiosyncrasies (See the doctor at once!) have a common nature, which is angelic. He who gave us the Golden Rule, of which you have just had another version, performed the most stupendous of all miracles to break down an infinite chasm of separation which lay between divinity and humanity, and the approachableness of the Word made flesh filled the early Christians with wonder. "That which was from the beginning," they cried, "we have heard, we have seen with our eyes and our hands have handled." No one has ever tried so marvelously to put himself in another's place and no one has succeeded so infinitely well as He who was from the beginning.

LITERATURE

Literature and Weather

AS all the world is aware, no true Bostonian will ever express an opinion regarding the quality of to-day's weather till he has read the Evening Transcript. Yesterday's atmospheric conditions he will discuss with enthusiasm, to-morrow's probable temperature he may timidly forecast, and he is sometimes ready to prove that last week's humidity was greater than that of the corresponding period thirteen years ago. But no power on earth can make the loyal citizen of St. Botolph's town commit himself to any statement about the weather of to-day until he has carefully studied in the seclusion of his home, after night has fallen, the Transcript's first editorial.

He may then learn on infallible authority that to-day, for instance, "was fair," that "the temperature was high for the season," that there "was no rain up to midday," that "in the open it was a little warmer than yesterday, though the wind was higher," that the "day has been bright and pleasant," or that it actually "snowed last night." Not infrequently valuable information of this kind is imparted with a literary charm that makes the news all the more welcome. After a glowing description, for example, of the unprecedented mildness of a January day, the Transcript's seer throws a prescient eye on the meteorological conditions that are likely to prevail in Boston next June, takes thought, and sternly represses his emotions, saying:

> This prodigality of poetic praise is rather extravagant because what will there be left to say, when the green leaves come again, the roses bloom and the honeysuckle diffuses its fragrance around the front door? Wintry conditions may sometimes justify heroics but rarely lyrics, and even now we may be drifting away from the conditions that have inspired these outpourings.

On another evening, however, he scorns restraint, puts spurs to Pegasus and offers the reader this:

> Nearly a week has elapsed since we have been permitted an unobstructed view of the moon and the morning star. The former luminary is now at the gibbous stage, and will not attain full effulgence again for many days to come. The light of the latter is said to be dimming, but the loss was not sufficient to lessen appreciation of its beauty this morning after its long seclusion. It was one of the bright touches of the beautiful purple dawn whose rich tints were the reward of the early riser and the habitual observer. After enduring life under a canopy of darkness for so long, the morning light and its accompanying spectacular effects have been doubly welcome.

The Transcript's weather chronicle is also rich in reflections of a hopeful, optimistic character, for the prophet is always confident that to-morrow is sure to be milder and brighter than to-day, and he is an adept at displaying to advantage the silver lining of even the darkest cloud. Bostonians are reminded, for instance, that:

> We have the most of winter behind us and there is always inspiration in following the beckoning finger of the reopening season. . . . Fortunately cold weather does not stay long when the sun is every day mounting higher, and by to-morrow we may expect a milder temperature. . . . There have been two ways of looking at the recent storm. One was to grumble at its undoubted physical discomforts. Another was to enjoy Nature in her rarely bejeweled aspects.

But the cautious reserve practised by Transcript readers whenever to-day's weather comes up for discussion certainly tends to make the men of Boston, it must be owned, less amiable and affable than are the natives of some of our other large cities. The genial Baltimorean, for instance, will break an important business engagement just for the pleasure of enlarging eloquently on the balminess of the city's climate as he accompanies for several squares the inquiring stranger. Even the tense-faced Gothamite has been known to forget Wall Street for a moment and actually grow lyrical when the salubrity of New York is his theme, and as for the Metropolis of the Middle West, "it is a matter of common knowledge" that the most lofty flights of her poets have been inspired by Lake Michigan's refreshing breezes. Indeed, unless weather were a grim reality, or a pleasant one, as the case may be, some of the finest passages in our literature never would have been penned. Even the author of the "best seller" to eke out his needed 300 pages of printed matter has more than once been forced to run in a "gripping" description of atmospheric conditions that intensified the heroine's distress or the villain's hate.

Unquestionably the value of weather as the theme of a literary masterpiece is very high but as a subject for sustained conversation a day's barometric and thermometric changes are even richer still in matter. Men who widely differ from one another in age, race, education, religion, and even in politics, are constantly observed to agree perfectly regarding the atrocity of a day's temperature, and the bitterest commercial rivals will often be found to have but one opinion about the timeliness, say, of an April shower. Even in a period so wearing on the affections as is the present, the most violent "pro's" and "anti's" will pleasantly discuss the mild winter we have had and thus discover how many tastes they have in common. Consequently they part, as a rule, with feelings of profound respect for one another's judgment.

Brilliant social triumphs, moreover, lie within the easy reach of all who can bring to the quotidian appraisal of the weather a certain freshness of expression and novelty of phrase. This, however, is a rare accomplishment for, since the world began, so much has been said, and excellently said, on that familiar subject that no one but a genius can now give a strikingly original description of a day's meteorological phenomena. But where there is no difficulty there is no praise, and those who devote their lives to seeking new terms in which to give an analysis of the prevailing weather, will not only merit the blessings of posterity, but even now will be rewarded by becoming social stars of the first magnitude. Such a man is the salvation of dull dinners and the solace of the perplexed hostess. A subject which has hitherto served merely as an introduction to what are considered more important topics he will invest with such charm and interest that guests will listen to him like three-years children. He will be the acknowledged lion of every social function he attends.

Such a genius will be highly successful in guiding conversation aright, and in preventing awkward pauses. Who has not experienced how many an embarrassing situation a cleverly inserted remark about the weather has saved? But owing to the jejune and commonplace character of the average man's observations on this large subject, there is great danger of the conversers' interest soon flagging. Here would come our gifted proficient's opportunity. For his comments on the weather will be so entertaining, novel and recondite, his searching questions will so stir the deeper feelings of his hearers, he will descant with such glowing enthusiasm, upon the wind and the rain, the clouds and the sunbeams, that the company he graces will joyfully listen to him for hours and hours.

But, best of all, this adept in weather lore would be a zealous promoter of kindness and charity. Just as Blessed Thomas More was wont to protest, when the fair name of the absent was being rended, "Be that as it may, I maintain that this house is well built!" our social meteorologist will exclaim when another's reputation is threatened with extinction: "What finer weather could there be than that we had yesterday!" or "To-day's humidity is the greatest for fifty years, as the following statistics will prove." He will then launch himself on the full stream of his eloquence and discourse so movingly on the blessedness of sunshine or the value of humidity that his enchanted hearers will leave their neighbor's name ungored.

REVIEWS

The Straight Path; or Marks of the True Church. By the REV. M. J. PHELAN, S.J. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $0.80.

Those who heard this eloquent Irish Jesuit defending the claims of the Church during his recent visit to the United States will be glad to know that some at least of his impressive sermons have been put into permanent form. The little volume of 174 pages treats of a subject that is by no means new, but is ever useful. Unity, holiness, catholicity and apostolicity are shown by passages quoted from the Old and the New Testaments to be essential characteristics of the Church that Christ founded. These four marks are then proved to be luminously distinctive of the Church that is called Catholic, and to be conspicuously absent from all of the other churches that claim to be Christian. This forms the first part of the volume. The second part is devoted to a study of the infallibility of the Pope, its meaning and its actual inherence, as an inalienable prerogative, in the successor of Saint Peter. The last chapter consists of an historical retrospect on the trials and triumphs of the papacy. The treatment throughout is clear, logical and convincing. A chastened and restrained Celtic imagination by its flashes of color lightens the pages that are nevertheless philosophically severe. A careful avoidance of anything like controversial bitterness makes it a book that one could put without misgivings into the hands of even sensitive non-Catholics; while its careful prose, its evident sincerity, and its frequent appeals to the Scriptures are calculated to propitiate educated, well-read seekers after truth. It is to be regretted that the limits which the author set himself, necessitated brevity of treatment. For Catholics who are familiar with the doctrines, this no doubt is an advantage; but for prospective converts more expansion would have been preferable. J. H. F.

Émile Verhaeren. By STEPHAN ZWEIG. Translated by J. BITHELL. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $2.00.

Not every reader of this monograph, in which the Viennese poet-critic studies the ideals, the methods and the influence of the Belgian writer, will unconditionally surrender to its facile enthusiasm and flattering verdict. A hero-worshiper, Stephan Zweig kneels with unquestioning faith and evident sincerity at the shrine of the author of "Les Aubes," "Les Villes Tentaculaires," "Hélène de Sparte," "Toute la Flandre," "Les Blés Mouvants." Nor is he alone in his fervid devotion. Such eminent critics and writers as Ellen Key, de Régnier, Berjussow and G. Brandes join in the homage. Our critic proves that some of that homage is justified. We may not call Émile Verhaeren the greatest of living poets, or a song-smith of the noblest breed. But we ungrudgingly admit that he sounds a note of vibrant power and originality, that his utterances are spontaneous, personal and vehemently modern. Few living poets have so imprisoned in the rhythm of their verse the whir of the loom, the roar of the red-lit iron-mill, the din of the steaming city streets, the clatter and confusion of the tawdry theater or the crowded inn. Neither Maeterlinck, Lemonnier, von Lerberghe nor Rodenbach have so faithfully etched the jarring contrasts of a Flemish landscape, the pendulous lace-work of lofty spires mirrored in the sluggish river, the sand-dunes and mounded dykes, the cloisters of gray convents, the tints and blooms of Belgian fields and farms. With keen and dramatic analysis, too, Verhaeren can bare the secrets of the soul. But two elements are generally lacking in the Belgian work, without which there can be no supremely great poetry, genuine nobility of feeling and faith. In his verse, rugged, tortured, muscular as a statue of Rodin, there is, especially in the earlier productions, a Rabelaisian undertone of repellent coarseness and sensualism. It reminds us most unpleasantly of the too-evidently emphasized vulgarity of certain canvases of Jordaens, Teniers and Jan Steen. To this disheartening materialism is added Verhaeren's recurrent cry of revolt against the creed and the ideals which have made his country's true greatness, the creed of his boyhood, when a pupil of the Jesuits at Sainte-Barbe in Ghent, "he wept and prayed before the altar, with folded hands." He has fashioned for himself strange gods, science, progress, industrialism, liberty, the religion of a perfectly realized self. He has tried to "chisel a new face of Christ." If he turns away from the Christ of the Gospels and the Catholic Church he will lose the highest gifts of poesy. A purer, more tender note seems of late to have glided into his song. The tragic sorrows of his beloved Belgium may deepen it to a really spiritual and religious harmony. Then only will he give to the world the full measure of his great and undeniable powers.

Pulpit Themes. Adjumenta Oratoris Sacri. By REV. FRANCIS SCHOUPPE, S.J. Translated by REV. P. A. BEECHER, M.A., D.D., Professor of Pastoral Theology and Sacred Eloquence, St. Patrick's College, Maynooth. Dublin: M. H. Gill, Ltd. 7s. 6d.

The aim of the Maynooth Professor of Sacred Eloquence has been to offer not so much a translation as a "transvaluation" of Father Schouppe's famous book of sermon outlines, which has passed through fourteen editions on the Continent. Throughout a wide experience in the study and examination of homiletic literature he has always been of the opinion that the present work is the best of all that have passed under his notice. He is not partial in his estimate of Father Schouppe when he says of him: "A profound theologian and distinguished Scriptural scholar, he had withal a rare gift of imagination, which enabled him to turn his learning to account in applying it to everyday life." Father Schouppe's outlines are richly suggestive of thought, while often interfused with a warmth of feeling and a wealth of comparison and imagery which enforce his doctrine. The translator, if we may so call him, has given to the book whatever further amplification or application that came to mind in his own study of the text. The work is thus given the freshness of originality without losing its own peculiar merit. The book will supply thoughtful laymen with solid food for reflection, and priests, for whom, of course, the work is chiefly intended, will find in it suggestive outlines for discourses on the great truths of faith. A good index arranges the volume's contents according to the Sundays and principal feasts of the year.

The Unknown Guest. By MAURICE MAETERLINCK. New York. Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.50.

The future, the past and the present viewed in the light of eternity trouble the mind of Maurice Maeterlinck; nor is this all; this "quietly profound thinker" now rehearses his doubts, theories, suggestions and insinuations regarding clairvoyance, haunted houses, fluidic asepsis, veridical apparitions, and the miraculous cures at Lourdes. The ultimate force, psychic, subliminal, fluidic, or what you will, back of all these, Maeterlinck calls the "Unknown Guest." He sets aside "religious hypotheses" because they begin "by calling for an act of adherence of blind faith" and the "profound thinker" stirred to the depths of his intellectual greatness by the mathematical genius of an "educated horse" can not find it in his power to make such a "blind act." He gazes into the limpid antelope-eyes of the trained equine scholar Muhamed seeking a sign but sees none; he witnesses the wonderful feats of the animal and concludes that very probably a new spirit is passing over the world. Man he classes with the Elberfeld trained horses. Noble conclusion of a mind unshackled by the narrow dogmas of "so-called revealed religions"! We live, suffer and die without knowing why, and these horses raised by man from their immemorial sleep, in the author's opinion, do the same. No doubt M. Maeterlinck feels honored in thus sharing the wisdom of quadrupeds for he allows himself to be introduced to the learned horse "Hans" as its "uncle." He is welcome to the compliment.

"The East I Know." By PAUL CLAUDEL. New Haven: Yale University Press. $1.25.

This book is a translation, excellently done, of Paul Claudel's "La Connaissance de l'Est." The author is well known to the French public as a poet and dramatist, and this book will introduce him to American readers. M. Claudel here gives a series of sketches of the East where he spent some years in the French consular service. He has great skill in word-painting along with a happy gift of calling up familiar images, often very homely, which bring his scenes vividly before the mind's eye. "The plain with its field resembles an old stained-glass window with irregular panes set in a network of lead." "As on wall-paper the same scene is repeated, so on every side we see great wooden vats with men who, face to face, beat ears of corn against the sides;" are two of his similes, but, taken from their setting, they show but imperfectly the author's powers of description. In reading the book, however, the feeling is often one of disappointment, for though the imagination is fed and the fancy tickled, there is too much vagueness in the majority of the sketches and the reader feels that he is not fully repaid for the time spent. When M. Claudel's dramatic works appear in English dress they will doubtless be widely read but "The East I Know" will hardly be popular with Americans.

Pro Fide, a Defence of Natural and Revealed Religion. By CHARLES HARRIS. New York: E. P. Dutton & Company. $3.50.

To the Christian public Dr. Harris's able defence of the Christian Revelation will doubtless prove a source of strength and consolation, and the more so, as in these days of bustle and progress both authors and publishers, in their mad desire for creating and editing novelties, show scant consideration for the sacred and solidly grounded traditions of the past. There is more solid argumentation in a single chapter of "Pro Fide" than is usually found in a rationalistic book from cover to cover. Dr. Harris founds his conclusions on arguments; the typical liberal of the day basks complacently in the mists of hypotheses, and waves aside his adversaries with the Horatian Odi profanum vulgus, et arceo. Still, depite its great merit, the "Defence of Natural and Revealed Religion" has its defects, as for instance the philosophical presentation of the infinity of God, the hasty and almost disdainful treatment of Papal infallibility and the insufficient investigation of the religions of Australia. For these reasons it can not be called entirely acceptable to the Catholic or the ethnologist.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The ancient and oft-repeated calumny that, according to Jesuit teaching, the end sanctifies the means, has been revived once more. So the Rev. Robert Swickerath, S.J., Professor of History at Holy Cross College, Worcester, Mass., has laid it low—for a time. Under the title "The Jesuit Myth," his paper appears in the current Catholic Mind. In response to many requests from our readers, Father John J. Ford's convincing article on "Capital Punishment," long out of print, is republished in this number and is followed by Father Fisher's brief comparison of the Church's Index with the war's censorship.

"Early Conversions to the Church in America" is the title of a book that Miss Georgina Pell Curtis, the editor of "Some Roads to Rome in America," and "Beyond the Road to Rome," now has in preparation. The work is designed to cover the period from 1607 to beyond the middle of the nineteenth century, and will be confined to sketches of converts who are no longer living. As the book will require a great deal of research, the editor is eager to secure the cooperation of AMERICA's readers, so they are invited to send to her at 5000 North Ashland Avenue, Chicago, short biographies of converts or brief accounts of conversions and, if other matter is lacking, mere names and dates will be welcome.

The title of "Instructions d'un Quart d'Heure," by the Abbé J. Pailler (Paris, Pierre Téqui) is a fair index of the book's contents, for the volume contains fifteen-minute expositions of the Christian doctrine. For Lent there is a series of instructions on the Sacrament of Penance, and during the rest of the year the other tenets of Catholicism are clearly explained. The volume, which has already passed into its thirteenth thousand, is the garnered fruit of forty years of priestly activity and the instructions are neither scoldings nor entreaties, but brief explanations of the Church's teachings.

"The Ladder" by Philip Curtiss (Harper, $1.30) is a fictional autobiography in which is set forth the varying fortunes of one Franklin Connor from the time he was a friendless, penniless boy of sixteen until he becomes rather well provided with this world's goods. In early years he was a profane, worthless boy, no better than the low company that he frequented. In later years it was the circumstances that changed rather than the man himself, so that the title "Ladder" is not altogether apt. Mr. Connor seems to have been put through some phases of his life just that the author might have an occasion to touch on certain questions. "The Ladder" is less a story than a collection of essays on various phases of American life. "Having once tasted blood we become regular scenicides," says Mr. Connor, speaking of the slashing of the play he had dashed off. The author could have profitably subjected his book to the same treatment and called in some friends as "chaptericides"!

"Problems of Community Life, an Outline of Applied Sociology" (Crowell, $1.00), is a very hard book to read, because Seba Eldridge, the author, has eliminated the verb from his vocabulary. He writes like Gertrude Stein, or Walt Whitman in his less lucid moments. To do him justice, possibly a dozen verbs, neuter, colorless things, may be found in the course of one hundred and eighty pages, but for the most part, one is forced to consider such impressionistic paragraphs as this: "Education as a primary function of life: educational import of productive processes, consumption standards, social intercourse modes, and other institutional forms, and of individual acts independent of institutional guidance." After nearly two hundred pages of this, the suspicion arises, that Mr. Eldridge sent the index, and not his book, to the publishers. These gentlemen say that the work is indispensable, but for what, we frankly confess we do not know. The author seems to advocate a number of pagan practices high in favor with the extremist camp of modern sociologists, but this may be only a seeming. Perhaps he merely lists them. The only impression definitely conveyed by the book, is the author's utter hatred of verbs.

Here are some recent five-cent pamphlets suitable for the vestibule book-rack: "Find the Church" (Loyola University Press, Chicago) is a clear and well-reasoned guide which Father William Poland, S.J., has prepared for those who ask, "Where does the name 'Church of Christ' belong?" and "How shall we get the doctrines taught by Christ?" The argument is addressed to those who believe Christ divine and that He has established a Church. In "The Roman Catholic Church: for What Does She Stand?" (Catholic Truth Society, Pittsburg), Dr. Thomas F. Coakley proves that the Church is the defender of the Bible, of certainty in religion, of the home and Christian education. "The Forbidden Fruit of Mixed Marriages" (St. Joseph's Printing Office, Collegeville, Ind.) is the title of an earnest warning and appeal Father Godfrey Schlachter, C.PP.S. gives young men and women who are inclined to seek a life-partner outside the Fold. "Elementary Questions Concerning the Roman Index of Forbidden Books" is a handy leaflet issued by the Mission Press of Techny, Ill.: "Hints and Aids to Happiness for Catholic Patients in Hospitals," written by a chaplain of Cook Co. Hospital, Chicago, gives excellent counsels on how to profit spiritually by sickness. W. Thornton Parker, of Northampton, Mass., has prepared a devotional pamphlet called "The Stations of the Cross for the Sick and the Dying" ($0.10); The America Press has printed on a convenient leaflet the Holy Father's decree about Peace Sunday and gives the text of the prayer he prescribes ($0.20 a hundred), and P. J. Kenedy & Sons, New York, are the American agents for the sale of Cardinal Mercier's now famous "Pastoral Letter" on the war in Belgium ($0.10). "Catholic Belief and Practice" (Diederich-Schaefer Co., Milwaukee, $0.15), Father James E. McGavick's excellent little book of instructions, in which nearly 150 subjects ranging from "Advent" to "Vigils" are explained, is now in its seventh edition. Kenedy is publishing an attractive series of St. Patrick's Day postal cards bearing appropriate and musical verses by Father Francis P. Donnelly, S.J. The lines entitled "Machree" are the best. ($0.20 a dozen.)

The countless admirers of Gilbert K. Chesterton will be relieved to hear that he is slowly recovering from the serious illness that laid him low. Writes the London correspondent of the Boston Evening Transcript:

> Mr. Chesterton was taken suddenly ill some weeks ago with congestion of the lungs, and from this developed dilation of the heart—a combination of troubles which, in a man of great physical weight, who has not taken particularly good care of himself, always gives rise to grave anxiety. When I say "good care of himself," I mean simply that "G. K." has good-naturedly allowed all the editors of Christendom to burden him with commissions and that he has been altogether too anxious to keep his literary and other engagements to think of his health. Nor has he paid much attention to friendly words of warning. He has just kept on producing and producing, as much from the sheer pleasure of writing as from a legitimate desire to benefit financially from an assured literary position, and when he got physically tired of dictating or correcting page-proofs he went out and talked. During recent years, he has been at the beck and call of any one who, on the ground of public helpfulness, asked him to make a speech, and he frequently took part in "debates" with Bernard Shaw, Hilaire Belloc and others, helping to fill halls with laughing hearers, and getting little or nothing out of it for himself. In other words, he has been a wilful boy—a big-hearted, capricious boy—full of the joy of intellectual living, and gaily wanton in his expenditure of strength. To many of his friends the wonder is, not that he is prostrate now, but that the inevitable has not happened sooner.

That Mr. Chesterton had a "stroke," however, is denied. Though it will be some time before he is well enough to take up literary work again, we may feel sure that he will make excellent "copy" out of his convalescence.

EDUCATION

Buying Opinions?

NO charge has been repelled with greater heat by the barons of finance than the accusation that they are in the market for opinions. Many students of current history, who have never formulated the charge definitely, have uneasily questioned the influence of certain huge Foundations upon education and philanthropy. They protest too much, for one thing, these Foundations, and despite their ready disclaimer of hostility to religion, it is in the record that no school or association may receive their aid, and retain its distinctively religious character. This plan of action may not be precisely the same as buying opinions, but, as we know, human ingenuity has devised more than two or three ways of killing a cat.

POWER AND RESPONSIBILITY

It has been said in their defence that, after all, a man has a perfect right to use his wealth as he pleases. This anarchical statement is in no sense true, and can hardly be urged in seriousness, except by the mentally and morally irresponsible. One may as well claim that a man has a perfect right to use his dynamite as he pleases, or his motor car, or his intellect, or his fists. Power is strictly conditioned by responsibility, and responsibility implicitly affirms the truth that we are not morally free to do as we wish, even with what we call our own. It implies that there is a tribunal to which an account must be rendered. Ultimately, this tribunal is God. Proximately, however, our responsibility is to law, right custom, and even to reasonable public opinion. Dismissing the ultimate tribunal from the discussion, there is reason to believe that these Foundations create their own tribunal of responsibility, and acknowledge subjection only to the powers which they themselves form or control.

EDUCATIONAL PROSELYTERS

Even though we may not admire, we can respect an organization which draws its vitality from a great principle. But an organization which owes its being to money, is sustained by money, and is not above the suspicion of using money as the chief argument for the propagation of its purposes, is despicable. While it is plain that Mammon was the least exalted of the hosts that fell, it is almost equally plain that his spirit largely dominates the souls of men. St. Ignatius surely knew human nature when he represented the enemy as instructing his recruiting agents to foster the love of money in all whom they would gain to their standard. It is a bait that lures. True, there are men and institutions that are never requested to name their price. No one dreams, for instance, of asking a Catholic college to exchange its old chapel for a new laboratory. Nor is the proposition put so bluntly to any institution which holds that religion has its place in the intellect and works of man. Fundamentally, however, the program is that made familiar by those missionaries who proselyte with soup. "We do not ask you," they say in effect, "to sever your allegiance to any creed. That is quite your own concern. The 'sectarian' college has, in the past, done excellent work in education. Even to-day, in certain localities, at least, it serves a useful purpose. But we can not support, or in any way aid, a 'sectarian' school. Definite religious belief must necessarily shackle the mind in its search for truth."

IRRESPONSIBLE STANDARDIZERS

More than once has the Carnegie Foundation protested that it is not working for the destruction of the "sectarian" school. Of course, no such purpose is mentioned in its charter, and it is true that the Foundation has never, so far as is known, definitely marked out a "sectarian" college for immediate destruction, although at times, it has "advised" that certain colleges be closed or "merged" with other institutions. Crude, direct methods would defeat themselves. The Foundation conceives that its purpose may be effected more securely by quieter and apparently more innocent means. And hence we have a private corporation, responsible to no Church, responsible only in a loose sense to the State, seeking to establish and impose upon all schools and colleges, its own standard of excellence, subsidizing the while those institutions which willingly accept it.

"A TENDENCY TO EVIL"

Speaking at a meeting of the Association of American University Professors, held in New York last month, Dr. Josiah Royce of Harvard was bold enough to question the educational value of this purpose of the Foundation. In his opinion, "standardization" as it exists in this country to-day, is "a tendency to evil." It is founded on the principle, false in pedagogy, that we must "all take on the same standard as to our customs, as to our plans, as to our knowledge, as to our investigations, as to our naturally diverse opinions." Far from being "scientific," as is claimed, this excessive standardizing reduces "by external pressure" all schools to a dead level, and thus is apt to "degrade and disgrace educational life."

> Precisely in those regions of our life where individual judgment and initiative are needed, we do not need the same standards. Whoever tries to force the same standards on us in these respects, tends to make us what the old-fashioned Chinese scholars are said to have been. . . . Any institution or foundation, whether benevolent or not in its intentions, becomes a just object for careful and considerate criticism in case its nature or its tendencies show that it is liable to over-emphasize the standardizing disposition. Whatever foundation has large control of financial resources . . . should welcome close and constant scrutiny of the relation of its work to the motives which are prominent in forming the spirit of scholarship and of investigation, in guiding the lives and ideals of the teachers, and in controlling their private and personal fortunes. (Italics inserted.)

These plain words were spoken with particular reference to the activities of the Carnegie Foundation. If the standard which this Foundation seeks to impose, is to include a supervision of the "lives and ideals of the teachers," it is fair to argue that the Foundation, having done its best to expel religion from the school, now proposes to adopt as a logical necessity, the rule of recognizing as "acceptable" teachers, only those men and women who are willing to sell their creed for a salary.

THE DOMINATION OF MAMMON

"Funds of gigantic proportions, administered by trustees of broad powers," writes the editor of the Saturday Evening Post, "have almost as great potentialities for evil as for good." Only those who do not wish to see, or whose eyes have been bandaged with Mr. Carnegie's bonds, can deny that the Carnegie Foundation is seeking to control higher education in America, as the Methodist Bishop Candler writes, and further, that the Foundation is determined that neither in the schools nor in the lives of the teachers, as far as it can secure this end, shall the Christian religion have any part. Its ideals are purely and frankly materialistic. Speaking of a proposed law, the outcome of a Carnegie Foundation "research," the Burlington, Vermont, Daily News, thus criticizes what appears to be the one aim of this Foundation:

> We object to the bill because it represents a thoroughly materialized concept of education. It aims at the realization of the Carnegie Report, and the highest ideal embodied in that Report is "economic efficiency." . . . Culture is measured only in terms of material gain. Moral, spiritual and esthetic culture have no measurable value whatever in the Carnegie mind. The child is only an "economic unit," the method of his education must be "purposeful motor training," the aim is to make him "economically productive," and the end of it all, is not to make men but to make money. . . . The publication of the Report was followed by a continuous campaign of proselytizing for its adoption, directed and financed from the office of the Foundation. And now it is the avowed purpose of the Carnegie forces to allow no obstacle to prevent the passage of the bill through the legislature. What are we going to do about it?

Some years ago, the New York Journal of Commerce wrote, that as a mechanism for controlling academic opinion, there had been nothing in the history of education comparable with the "board system" of subsidizing learning. Time has confirmed this opinion. A financial system, with its own rules, customs and standards, subject to review only when the cumbersome machinery of the law has been set in motion, and possibly, not even then, with a directorate interlocking with the directorates of other moneyed Foundations, now seeks to dominate education in the United States from the kindergarten to the university. It is the domination of Mammon.

POUNDS, SHILLINGS, PENCE

Let it be allowed that Messrs. Carnegie and Rockefeller have never adopted the crude and inefficient bagman method of parading the streets, offering to buy old colleges. But in view of their activities, past and present, it is pertinent to note that the general purpose and methods of these Foundations are fixed by the men whose names they bear, to whom alone they are ultimately responsible. They will hardly deny that it is their aim to control the educational program of the country. Are we ready to take our educational creed from these barons of finance, and thus admit that, after all, the cynical Dombey was right when he said that money could do everything? For it is fairly plain that the sole credentials of Messrs. Carnegie and Rockefeller, as educational directors, are such as can be neatly printed on any adding machine.

SOCIOLOGY

Drifting

"YOU just knock that chip off my shoulder," says Bishop Greer to the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant, A.B., S.T.D., "I just dare you to."

"S'posin' I do?" one may imagine Dr. Grant replying. "S'posin' I do; what'll happen?" "Well, you just knock it off," rejoins the now heated shepherd of the New York diocese of the Protestant Episcopal Church, "and then see what you get."

Such, in the language of belligerent boyhood, is the casus belli between the Rev. Percy Stickney Grant, and his Right Reverend Father in God.

DR. GRANT AND MARRIAGE

Dr. Grant's difficulties are rooted in the circumstance that he is an amateur sociologist. Being, as it would seem, rather an ill-balanced person to boot, he has uttered and written more than his allotted share of foolish things. While it is the fate, if not the privilege, of all earthly pilgrims to play the fool from time to time, public opinion looks to see as little motley as possible in the pulpit. Dr. Grant has often disappointed this public expectation, but a Lenten noon-day "sermon" preached a few days ago, puts this reverend gentleman beyond the generous pale of what is loosely termed Christian morality. This occasion was deemed fitting by Dr. Grant to attack the indissolubility of Christian marriage, substituting for it, what ordinary folk would name, even if Dr. Grant does not, "trial marriage."

This gentleman's estimate of his own ability may be readily gauged by the fact that he deems himself fully competent to revise the Ten Commandments. One of these, he holds, is merely a survival of a barbarous period in which wives were bought and sold like cattle. This Commandment, he continues, fixed the opinion, which prevailed throughout the Middle Ages, and indeed until the beginning of the last century, that woman was a chattel and nothing more. In the disorder of coveting another's wife, no idea of spiritual wrong was involved, but merely the concept of property damage.

THE CHURCH AND MARRIAGE

To remind Dr. Grant of the unchanging position of the Catholic Church on the dignity of womanhood would probably be futile. It would be useless to suggest to a person of his mentality, her immutable stand, founded on the Gospel, in the matter of divorce. It would be losing one's time to recall to the memory of this Doctor of Divinity, those magnificent passages in which St. Paul, discussing the relations of marital life, bids the head of the family to love his wife, not only as his own body, tenderly, considerately, but even with a love approaching the love borne by our Divine Saviour to His peerless Bride, the Church. These are reflections which mean nothing to Dr. Grant. Rejecting history and the Holy Scripture, he finds his guides in "the poetry and romance of the Middle Ages," which he grossly misreads, and in "The Report of the Royal Commission on Divorce." His first authority proves that "the vast majority of marriages were arranged by relatives of the contracting parties, without reference to love." The second pleads for a "wider extension of the divorce laws." The argument is somewhat muddled; but Dr. Grant's point seems to be that the true concept of marriage, besmirched by the corruptions of Rome, lay hidden until brought to light and cleansed by the Royal Commissioners. This Report, therefore, especially since it is thoroughly Protestant, should rule the counsels of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the United States.

With his authorities cited, Dr. Grant rises to the height of his argument:

> Marriage is founded on the affection of two persons for each other. With the disappearance of such sentiments disappears the only ground for marriage. . . . If the only basis for marriage is love, why, in the event of that love being changed to loathing, should the marriage continue . . . Take a sane and fearless attitude on this question of divorce, and do not let yourself be put down by sneers or shrugs.

"Marriage for 'love'!" comments the New York Sun. "In the blunt phrase of early morning Broadway, 'highball marriage.'"

DR. GREER AND FREE SPEECH

It is cheering to be able to add that Doctors Manning, Houghton and Gilbert, of the Episcopal Church, promptly disavowed this barnyard morality. "These words," said Dr. Manning, "plainly and unequivocally teach free love. You can put no other construction upon them. They are an outrage against good citizenship as well as against religion." But the comment of Dr. Grant's bishop, the important phase of the matter, is another lamentable confirmation of the drifting of many modern religious leaders from the old standards of righteousness.

Dr. Greer approached the admittedly awkward crisis with the air of one who knew his duty and was determined to do it. Dr. Grant's opinions, he said, were in decided opposition to the mind and the law of the Episcopal Church. He had never read a sermon in which such views were expressed. He did not believe them common in the Church. At the same time, it must be remembered that Dr. Grant was quite free to express his opinion of this law and to agitate for its change. "Mr. Grant is free to say anything he wishes," the Bishop is quoted in the New York Sun and other papers, "but should he proceed to the extent of performing a marriage contrary to the canons, that would be quite another matter." "Say what you like, but just knock the chip off my shoulder, and see what happens to you." Dr. Greer has hardly met the situation with the firmness and vigor which might have been expected from the local head of a large and respectable religious body. From an Episcopal pulpit, a clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church gives utterance to language, rightly condemned by a brother clergyman, as an outrage on civilization and religion. Whether he meant it or not, and to the present he has not retracted it, is little to the point, for the scandal is a fact which still remains. And yet, his ecclesiastical superior feebly takes refuge in the absurd statement that Dr. Grant is free to express his opinions as he wishes, even, so it would appear, from the pulpit of a Church over which Dr. Greer exercises jurisdiction. The principle defended by the Bishop is more deplorable than the single act of Dr. Grant. If the control exercised over the clerical members of the Protestant Episcopal Church has fallen to this depth of impotence, then the pulpit statements of that Church own as little restraint, at least in Bishop Greer's diocese, as the enunciations of any convention of blasphemers, or of any conventicle of "Holy Rollers."

A Free Press and a Free Stage

Much publicity has accustomed us in this country to Hull House frothing and I. W. W. raving. The metropolitan press boasts that it is a forum of "free speech." In the hospitable pages of the New York Tribune, for example, "General" Rosalie Jones is allowed to prove that "family life is nearly always a handicap, that home is no place for children, that they should be sent to baby farms in the country." Mrs. Marion Wentworth is invited to plead for the emancipation of woman, by telling of her war-play "that all New York sobbed over," a play in which the heroine commits suicide, rather than fulfil her part of the marriage contract. Mrs. Leta Hollingsworth, Doctor of Philosophy, is then given her page to show that the home is a "myth," that "the care of children should be relegated to experts," and that a married woman is forced to choose between the duties of her state and her proper intellectual development.

Is It Mere "Raving"?

Is all this mere "raving," feverishly tossed into the world, and then forgotten? To assume this to be the truth, would be a dangerous error. Foul and ugly as these theories are, they blazon the pages of the newspaper and the magazine. They tell the story in many a best-seller. They are the lure of the play that runs to crowded houses. They have a strong appeal to the morally weak, to the man or the woman, hesitating at the gate of iniquity, seeking a justification for sin. The bright light of their tawdry cleverness soothes the stirring conscience of those in whom emotion is stronger than intelligence, while the glare points out the easy, yet respectable path to iniquity. "What I say three times is true," is the psychology of mobs and advertisers. And the story of modern sin, otherwise modern culture, has been told not three times, but is told daily, by sufferance of "free speech."

Dr. Greer will hardly stretch the easy tolerance of "free speech' to include the scandals of the problem-play and the printed page. But for Dr. Grant's misuse of the pulpit the Bishop has, apparently, no word of rebuke. Dr. Grant may say what he wishes, provided he does not translate his words into action. When asked, according to the New York Times, what action would be taken, should an Episcopal clergyman openly preach "free love," Bishop Greer repelled the question by replying that he did not care to deal with hypotheses. "We won't cross that bridge until we come to it."

The One Defender

The unmistakable present drift of things is toward the dishonor of Christian marriage. With the drift moves much that passes as religion. It is simple fact that the one force which, by insisting on the divine institution of the Sacrament of Matrimony, strives to turn the drift is the Catholic Church. Of no human origin, with no human interests to placate, without fear she confesses Christ before a faithless, scoffing world. Hers is no policy of expedience. It is but an unfaltering adherence to the principles of Christ. These alone can turn the restless, wandering souls of men to the paths of peace and righteousness.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A decision of the highest importance, rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States, affirms the constitutionality of the Oregon labor law. This law fixes an eight-hour period for women employed in manufacturing and mercantile concerns, but excepts graduate nurses in hospitals and women engaged in restaurants, boarding-houses, harvesting and fruit-canning. The decision establishes the principle that to reduce a woman's hours of labor to eight, is not an improper exercise of the State's police powers. The constitutionality of the Massachusetts ten-hour law, and the Ohio law fixing the maximum at fifty-four hours weekly, were upheld in previous decisions.

The following beautiful prayer, composed by Cardinal Newman, seems particularly appropriate in these days of stress at home and war abroad:

> May He support us all the day long, till the shades lengthen, and the evening comes, and the busy world is hushed, and the fever of life is over, and our work is done! Then in His mercy, may He give us a safe lodging, and a holy rest, and peace at the last.

Like so much that the great Cardinal wrote, the English of this prayer is like a strain of music. But in its spirit of unfaltering trust in God, our Father, lies its rare beauty.

That very solemn journal, Punch, is responsible for the statement that the following order was issued to the English troops in Flanders. Dendrologists and observers of equine habits may question its accuracy, but it will fill the heart of the zoophilist with joy:

> Though on occasion, it is necessary to tie horses to trees, this should be avoided whenever possible, as they are sure to bark, and thus destroy, the trees.

What has become of the association which proposed to open public subscriptions, looking to a better hospital service for the "horses at the front"? It is to be hoped that these strange persons have lapsed into permanent silence.

Catholics and Prohibition, a four-page leaflet published at North Evans, New York, is much exercised over the attitude of the Month and AMERICA on the subject of enforced prohibition. The Month is characterized as a follower of "British Jesuit ethics, guided by the brutish instinct for success in war." AMERICA, having advanced the banality, > prohibition, as a general policy, can hardly be defended, ethically or economically, except in the rare instance in which a community is so wedded to the intemperate use of alcoholic liquors that all other remedies are ineffectual, is accused of "even less common sense" than the Fortnightly Review:

> If the Jesuits of New York know of another effectual remedy for the plague of intemperance, they ought to bring it forth, instead of condemning the only effectual remedy now known.

The remedy against intemperance in words as well as in drink, which AMERICA would recommend, is a persevering use of the means of grace appointed by Christ. AMERICA also believes, that the habitual utterance of such strangely-conceived statements as "we do not even admit that alcoholic drink is a creature of God; it is concocted by human depravity, inspired by the devil," is, unless it be excused by invincible ignorance, an intemperance fully as reprehensible, to say the least, as intemperance in the use of intoxicating drink. Furthermore, the lack of charity evinced by the insinuation, that the efforts of the clergy of Arizona directed against the recent prohibition law are founded on "palatal, private and personal reasons," rather than on "concern for the Mass," shows plainly to what intemperance in the use of language leads.

"The trail of the serpent," reports the Pittsburgh Observer, "has been discovered in the legislatures of two States." In Texas, a bill has been introduced, providing that every child between the ages of eight and fourteen, shall attend the public school, unless he is being educated at home by a competent tutor, or in a private or parochial school approved by the county superintendent:

> This makes the superintendent of each school district, comments the Observer, the sole judge of the efficiency of private and parochial schools, and gives him the power of preventing any child from attending a school which in his judgment does not meet the requirements of the bill.

In Missouri, a bill whose paternity is easily discernible, provides for the inspection of > all public or private hospitals, reformatory homes, houses of detention, convents, asylums, sectarian seminaries, schools or institutions by the commissioners of the counties in which such institutions are situated.

It may be mentioned that there is little danger that either of these bills, or a similar measure, pending in Iowa, will become a law. The same may be said of the Bible-reading proposition now before the New York Legislature.

A correspondent writes the St. Vincent de Paul Quarterly, proposing to fuse certain modern financial methods with the spirit of the Society. The following answer should be studied by all charity workers, volunteer or professional:

> The spirit of the Rule is, never to allow the expenses of the Conference to get into arrears, but also not to lay up. . . . The works of the Conferences being entirely optional, should be from day to day; besides, nothing is more Christian than to trust one's self to Providence, and to count upon its inexhaustible care, when the work is undertaken for God. To make a reserve, to have before us a disposable capital which we never touch, to lay out beforehand a budget as in a relief association, are proceedings essentially contrary to the spirit of our Society. When it has anything, it gives bountifully and with a generous heart; if it has nothing, it appeals to the charity of its members, to that of their friends, of the public; and up to this day, God has never permitted that this confidence should be deceived.

There is an other-worldliness in this, a kind of divine recklessness, found only in true Christianity. Too often, perhaps unwittingly, does a certain condescension mar the work of charity. To be allowed to help those who can not help themselves is a privilege; for in the broken body, typical of the soul within, timid and forlorn after years of the world's hard usage, Faith sees the bruised and weary Saviour on His way to Calvary. Education without God may sometimes assume a fair exterior, but organized charity without God is, to all who have caught Christ's concept of charity, nothing less than repellent. The greatest need in the whole field of modern charity and sociology, is a generous infusion of the spirit of Jesus Christ. To exemplify the spirit of Christ is the purpose of the great St. Vincent de Paul Society. It should be in every parish in the United States. Particularly is it needed in the large cities, where the sacred name of charity is often used to veil a system of proselytizing among poor Catholics and Catholics of foreign birth or parentage.

Music has long been one of the potent allies of the Church. To the Mass and other ecclesiastical functions have been given a dignity and a charm and an added power to raise the heart to God by the medium of sound. The best in all the arts has constantly been pressed into the service of divine worship. Frescoes, marbles, incense, flowers all have their place in the Catholic Church, but her readiest road to the heart is perhaps through the ministry of music. Knowing this she has encouraged not only our Palestrinas, but our Elgars. Not only to the strictly liturgical function, but to the oratorio as well she has assigned a place in Catholic life. This has been the case from the time of the good St. Philip. And although the oratorio has been appropriated by the Anglicans and Lutherans as a semi-religious service and has even been taken over by the stage as a purely musical product, it has never ceased to be the original and the constant possession of the Church. Our readers will not be surprised therefore to learn that for ten years and more there has been a Catholic Oratorio Society in New York City. In pursuance of its annual custom, it will render this year, on March 26, "The Atonement," a modern work by the late S. Coleridge Taylor, which describes with intense color and emotion the Passion of our Lord. The purpose of the society, which has His Eminence John Cardinal Farley for its founder and the Right Rev. Bishop Cusack for its president, is to make young Catholic musicians ambitious to develop their gifts and employ their talents in a religious atmosphere, to purify their ideals by teaching them the highest in art, to check the desire to follow the cheap, demoralizing stage, and to create a demand for great Catholic artists and composers. Madame Kronold, who has been the inspiration and directress of the work, can not be given too much credit for the success which has hitherto crowned the movement.

Judge E. H. Gary may be fairly said to be what is considered a "successful man." His advice on how to attain success is therefore of interest, and "lying abed in a sunny room in a hotel," he thus dictated his views to an ubiquitous reporter:

> First, a young man should be thoroughly honest, frank and sincere. Second, he should be considerate of the interests of others. Third, he should have a good education. He must know the fundamentals, particularly grammar, spelling, arithmetic, geography and history. After these, the more he knows in other lines, including the classics, so much the better. Fourth, he must be careful in looking after his health, physical and moral.

This is "a power of good advice," as they say in certain rural districts, but doesn't it smack a little of old Polonius? Here is another bit of advice, set forth in homely fashion by a great American:

> Do not worry, eat three meals a day, say your prayers, be courteous to your creditors, keep your digestion good, steer clear of biliousness, exercise, go slow and go easy. Maybe there are other things that your special case requires to make you happy, but, my young friend, I reckon these will give you a good lift.

The second clause in this plan to attain happiness is not applicable to all during Lent. But apart from this phrase, the suggested program is a tribute to Lincoln's knowledge of human nature. All of us can not be successful, in Judge Gary's sense, but even without this sort of success it is possible to be happy.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable to Teachers and Students in Catholic Schools only.

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

NUMBER 5, VOL. XIII, MARCH 8, 1915.

Do Jesuits teach that the end justifies the means? The Rev. Robert Swickerath, S.J., refutes the calumny once more in

"THE JESUIT MYTH"

Has the State the right to execute criminals? Is it wise to do so? There is a vast deal of sentimentality and sophistry being published nowadays in answer to these questions. The Rev. John J. Ford, S.J., gives the correct doctrine in

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

In the concluding paper of the number Father Fisher shows that those who defend the war censorship of to-day are bound in consistency to admit the justice of the Church's Index.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never yet found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.
The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

CHRONICLE

The War.—There have been two principal theaters of operations in the West. The British, assisted by French artillery, by desperate efforts have succeeded in driving back the Germans a distance of two miles. Their victory has given them possession of Neuve Chapelle, and has brought them to the outskirts of Aubers. This gain is important both because it represents the greatest amount of territory won in France by either side since the beginning of trench warfare, and also because it gives strategic advantages which the Allies are said to believe will probably lead in the near future to the evacuation of La Bassée by the Germans. It is also thought to be the first step in the active campaign of the spring, so long promised by the British, and to be the prelude of a battle soon to develop in the vicinity of Lille. The Germans are reported to be massing troops at that place, apparently in anticipation of a determined drive by the Allies. The vigorous and uninterrupted attacks by the French in the Champagne district, with their constant though slight gains in territory, are declared by the French to have accomplished their object, which was to keep German troops from being transported to the east. Germany, on the other hand, states that not only has the campaign failed, but has also resulted in French losses out of all proportion to the amount of territory gained. A general advance by the Allies all along the line is reported in late dispatches, especially at Vauquois and near Dixmude.

Bulletin, Mar. 9, p. m.-Mar. 16, a. m.

British and French Successes

In Poland there has been intermittent activity, resulting, so it is claimed, in the capture of large bodies of troops. The offensive has been taken alternately by Germans and Russians, but without producing any marked change in the situation. The local successes, which are claimed by both sides, have been unimportant. Petrograd and Berlin put the number of the captures in tens of thousands, but apart from this are content, for the most part, to record that they have repulsed all attacks of the enemy. The new advance on Przasnysz, which the Germans say is being made in large numbers and with success, is explicitly declared by the Russians to have been checked. In the Carpathians adverse weather conditions have prevailed and have prevented any movements of importance. The Austrians have been on the offensive in many places, but have gained no great advantage. The Russians claim to have carried the Austrian positions at Lupkow and Smolnik.

No Change in Poland

Reports from the Dardanelles are somewhat conflicting. The Turks declare that the fire on the inner forts has been ineffective, while the British and French official reports state that two more forts have been destroyed. Seventy minesweepers are said to be at work on the mine fields, and the bombardment of the fortifications is steadily proceeding. The British commander is said, though the report is without official confirmation, to have predicted that the forcing of the strait would be an accomplished fact by Easter, provided the land forces, which are cooperating with the fleet, can continue their advance.

The Dardanelles

When the German cruiser, Prinz Eitel Friedrich, after roving the seas for many months, during which she was able constantly to elude the warships of the Allies and sink many of their ships, finally slipped unannounced into Hampton Roads for repairs, it became known that she had captured and sunk on the high seas the William P. Frye, a sailing vessel and trader, owned by American citizens and flying the American flag. She was carrying a cargo of grain from Seattle to Liverpool. The German captain destroyed the ship and the cargo, both of which were peaceful and ought to have been immune from attack. The reason that he assigned for his act was, that he judged the cargo, which was destined for an enemy's port, to be contraband. At first our press showed great indignation, but this attitude has given place to the more temperate view that it was an error of judgment, based on the Declaration of London, which, however, the United States had repudiated. It is reported that Berlin will disavow the action of the captain, Thierichsen, and, without waiting for any demand by the United States Government, will, of her own initiative, offer full reparation.

The William P. Frye

The progress of the Allies toward Constantinople has caused a ferment of war fever in the Balkans. Greece, Rumania and Bulgaria are all eager to share in the spoils.

War Fever in the Balkans

The opposition of King Constantine, of Greece, to the popular agitation for entrance into hostilities, headed by the Premier, Venizelos, led to the resignation of the entire Cabinet. M. Zaimis tried to form a new Cabinet, but failed. The present Cabinet, with M. Gounaris at its head, has intimated that neutrality will be its policy, but has given the Allies assurance that it will not be hostile to their interests. To prevent the fall of the new Cabinet the Parliament has been prorogued for a month. The Government of Rumania has been given power to proclaim martial law. Bulgaria is casting longing eyes on Adrianople; and it is reported that the opposition of King Ferdinand to the popular will has resulted in a ministerial crisis, ending in the resignation of M. Radoslavoff. Bulgaria's position is especially difficult.

The British Admiralty reports that during the first six weeks of the blockade declared by Germany in the war zone decree, there were 2,872 arrivals and sailings of ships of all nationalities recorded at the ports of Great Britain, and 8,734 arrivals and sailings of ships of all nationalities at the ports of the Empire. These figures do not include vessels used by the British Admiralty for military and naval purposes. Of these vessels fifteen were sunk by the Germans. From the beginning of the war up to March 10, the British losses in trade vessels amounted to 137. On March 14, the German cruiser Dresden was attacked by three British cruisers off the coast of Chili and sunk.

Austria.—A strong pastoral letter by the Prince Archbishop of Vienna, Cardinal Dr. Friedrich Gustavus Piffl, has been published in the Wiener Diözesanblatt. The ethics of war and its religious aspects are presented from their Catholic point of view. "The world war," he says, "has by the power of God been turned into a world mission, in which God Himself is preaching the first sermon upon the reality of His existence, and is pointing out to us once more the forgotten ways of salvation that lead to Him." He recalls a comparison, made by St. Thomas of Aquin, between the death of a soldier in a just war and the death of a martyr where the love of God inspires both. In a strain of solemn fervor and patriotism he encourages the faithful: "Reconciled to God and abandoned to His holy will, we shall look forward with firm confidence to the outcome of the war. We can rely upon the justice of our cause; for right is upon our side." He ends his pastoral with a reference to the peace-loving disposition of the aged Emperor, who, he says, yielded only to the extreme necessity of finally opposing the machinations of the country's enemies. "Should political assassination," he asks, "have been given the last word and should the Fatherland, with its more than thousand years of glorious history, have been allowed to sink into ruin?" The main object of the great Austrian prelate was to speak words of consolation to his flock and to inspire them with confidence for the future.

France.—The priests and Catholic laity of the country continue to pour out their blood in defence of France, while the anti-clerical "bloc" remains in Paris to conduct a contemptible campaign against the Church. The radical papers are given over to particularly offensive insinuations to the effect that patriotism must be set against Roman tendencies and such like twaddle. The Holy Father's benevolent and prudent attitude of strict neutrality combined with paternal sympathy for those affected by the war has been represented as hostility to French interests. The Temps, in a scandalous article, carps at the Pope's allocution and attempts to raise an issue by asserting: "What we know to be sure is that certain people, Catholic and up to this time deeply attached to the Apostolic See, have become hesitating and discontented and they are asking themselves whether the war game of the Vatican may not force them into open rupture." In one instance a journalist hints that the Holy See's attitude is assumed for a monetary consideration. In view of the theft of supplies intended for the French soldiers, this comes with particularly bad grace. There are bitter attacks on German Catholics, as if they were the cause of the war, and a Paris despatch to Popolo Romano, in describing the confiscation of the Pope's prayer for peace, seems to take it for granted that the prayer was eventually allowed on condition that peace with a French victory was the gift to be asked of God. This agitation received a slight check from Cardinal Gasparri's plain statement of the Pope's neutrality made to the editor of the Éclair.

It is clear that an organized attempt is being made to put enmity between the Catholics of France and the Holy See. The effort will be fruitless. The wonderful reaction in favor of the Church and the prelates still continues. The heroic bravery of the priests in battle, their ministrations in the trenches and in the field have awakened the Frenchman's sense of chivalry. Devotion to religion and to the priests was seldom greater. Men flock to the churches both in the villages and the large cities, and in some places the churches have been the scenes of great enthusiasm. It is probable, too, that the contemptible Government, which has never represented the majority of the French people, will soon have its eyes opened. The seizure of so many of the Eastern Catholic institutions by the Turks should warn them that on the day of final settlement the Holy See's power will be felt.

Germany.—Germany continues to be agitated about the importation of arms and ammunition from the United States. It is the one cause which has contributed more than any other to arouse sentiments of dissatisfaction. In the criticisms pronounced two different views are expressed. The first admits that there has been no technical violation of neutrality, but that our action is equivalently a denial of our avowed desire for peace. An American correspondent, writing from Europe, can not see how, "for the profit of a few manufacturers and the employment furnished a comparatively small number of laborers, we should be willing to have the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of European workingmen go on unabated." Another view reckons our action as a violation of neutrality. This opinion can be understood best from letters like the following, written from the front:

German Views of the United States

> We soldiers read with indignation in the papers sent us from home how American industry is providing the Allies with murderous instruments and powder. For six months we have now been fighting, in defiance of death, against a world of foes, in this war which has been thrust upon us. Long ago we would have overcome the opposing forces if peace-loving America had preserved her neutrality. We German soldiers had formerly thought better of the Star-Spangled Banner.

Other causes have likewise contributed to strengthen the impression that America has shown herself unfriendly to Germany. Maximilian Harden, in one of his latest articles, calls upon the people to bear with this good-naturedly, as a matter of fact, and not to disturb themselves about it. A change, he says, can not come about over night. It is evident, on the other hand, that there is no feeling of real enmity underlying the present irritation. Desire of establishing the best relations between the two countries is uppermost in the souls of all. But the exportation of arms to the Allies inevitably excites a certain degree of bitterness.

Great Britain.—Quite naturally the war still continues to engage British thought and energy almost completely. Enlistment seems brisk; apparently the recruits are drawn from all classes of men. The Times Supplement, under date of March 2, reports that up to December 31, 1914, 219 officers of the Board of Education had joined the colors; 37 had been "seconded" to the War Office or other departments for special service; seven inspectors are at present giving part-time service, while 5,729 teachers have gone to the front. These figures, large though they be, are not complete. The London County Council states that by June 30 there will be an actual deficiency of 441 teachers in London alone. Up to February 25, 2,000 Anglican ministers had volunteered as chaplains. An alumnus of the Oratory School, Edgbaston, states that out of 430 pupils, past and present, between the ages of 18 and 40, 250 cast their lot with the army and navy. Of these, 16 have been killed and 20 more have been wounded; seven are in command of battalions; one of those killed died in command. This means that there is one colonel to every seven boys now at the Oratory School. The Dacia incident and the Ship's Purchase Bill did not seriously affect the attitude of the Britons toward the United States. Two of the more prominent reviews, the Spectator and the Outlook, were somewhat violent in their denunciations. The Spectator, generally calm, quite forgot its cold dignity and talked like a dowager in high dudgeon. The Outlook is even more vehement. It declares that the United States seeks to outrage neutrality, thus becoming "the supporter of those who are marching through broken treaties and the shattered traditions of humanity toward their goal of universal military dominion." It speaks of "deadly outrage upon all international law and precedent," denounces the President as an "amiable doctrinaire," who has prated of arbitration and of the brutality of war, "but now, when the test has come, has fallen to the bottom of the pit of evils" by becoming "the tool, the dupe, at once of those fellow-citizens whose sole concern is to make money out of the agony of half-mankind, and of German agents, whose single business it is to create trouble for the Allies." Then follows these and other sinister words:

War Items

> Let our Cabinet decline absolutely to discuss the subject any further with the United States except in association with our principal friends, among whom Japan has an important place, for Japan also has a deep interest in the duration of the strife, and as a sea power has a right to be consulted.

Perhaps the Outlook's temper would be calmed by reading the tirades in the German papers against the exportation from America of arms and ammunition to the Allies.

Ireland.—The Defence of the Realm Act, which empowered the authorities to try by summary courtmartial any person suspected of saying, writing or doing anything deemed injurious to his majesty's forces and to sentence to death or imprisonment persons convicted of such offence, has been in active operation in Ireland. John Hegarty, of Cork, one of several Post Office officials dismissed for being an officer or member of the Irish Volunteers, was removed to Dublin by motor and court-martialed for having "seditious literature" in his possession. William Buckley, a County Cork Gaelic teacher, was courtmartialed in the Cork military barracks on like charges, and a large number of others in various parts of the country have been similarly tried for "sedition," which generally means the expression of views opposed to enlistment, or the possession or distribution of anti-recruiting pamphlets, the New York Irish World, or such other suppressed or prohibited papers as oppose special recruiting. The act has been recently amended, on the ground that "it rendered every one liable to be court-martialed." The amendment gives "an accused British subject a four days' option of being tried by a civil tribunal," but it is announced that the penalties remain the same and the original powers are only suspended, not surrendered. One of the seditious pamphlets gives an account of an attempt alleged to have been made on the life or liberty of Sir Roger Casement by Mr. Findlay, British consul in Norway, with a photograph of the consul's signed agreement to pay $25,000 for his capture. The Norwegian Government brought the matter before the British Foreign Office, and the consul was recalled. Sir Roger is said to be strongly urging on Germany that the most effective way of permanently weakening England, in the event of a successful issue for itself, is to set up an independent Government in Ireland, and the "seditious" Irish are supposed to be in sympathy with this object. Whether these are numerous or insignificant is impossible to ascertain, owing to the present vigilant censorship of newspapers and letters.

Mexico.—The news from Mexico is dismal in the extreme; riots, loot, murder, lies sum it up. On March 11 four Spaniards and one Swede were killed in the capital, and several Spanish ships were looted. Pillaging had been in progress ten days. Our Secretary of State warned Americans to leave Mexico City, and for once, in a long time at least, Carranza agreed with him and advised a general exodus of all foreigners. Three American newspaper men added a whimsical touch to the situation by cabling that no means of transportation could be had. Conditions became so bad that the "friendly representations" of our Government became "a stern admonition" to Carranza. The old gentleman was not disturbed. He answered jauntily, attempting to read the State Department a lesson in official etiquette and denying most of the allegations made against his régime in Mexico City, thereby contradicting our "special agent," the Brazilian Minister, and the International Relief Committee, whose members, he says, are tainted with Huertista ideas and sympathies. Thus the value of Carranza's reply can be tested. Later in the week Obregon slipped out of the city and Zapata slipped in. The monkeys were at play once again. A tragedy followed quickly, however. An American citizen was killed at close range, in his home, by the advance guard of Zapata's troops. At the time of the murder the American flag was flying over the victim's house and the Brazilian seal was on the door. A few days before the murder the victim's wife wrote to her mother. After repeating the well-known facts about the abominable lust of the Constitutionalists she proceeds, in part, as follows:

More Deviltry

> The conditions in Mexico City are unbelievable. The Zapatistas are all around the city, and have done everything that the Carranzistas could not accomplish to make us uncomfortable. They have dammed up the Viga Canal so that the farmers can not bring in vegetables or fodder from Xochimilco, and as the city sewers are flushed with the water of the Viga, things are becoming pretty odoriferous. They have also cut the water supply from Xochimilco, so that people who have no wells get only an hour's supply of water daily, in consequence of which we fear an epidemic of contagious diseases. They make raids, constantly, on the nearest suburbs such as San Angel, Mexcoac, San Pedro and all the small towns along the Viga, so that the storekeepers in these places never know when they are going to lose their entire stock, and several of them have been killed for remonstrating. They will not allow any charcoal to come into the city, so that many of the poor people are unable to get fuel, and they have chopped down every pole of the street-car line which runs along the Viga and have burned them up.

Meantime, religious conditions are not improving. Palavicini is out with new decrees, forbidding Catholic colleges and schools; priests are still in prison; and the great church of St. Brigid, in Mexico City, has been maliciously desecrated by the socialists, to whom Carranza gave it over. The Archbishop of Mexico City, who is now in New Orleans, is quoted by the press to this effect:

> Conditions in Mexico are to-day more deplorable than at any period in the modern history of the republic . . . and the cry of her millions of men, women and children who have suffered too long from the ravages of banditry and disorganized revolution should appeal to the humanitarianism of Christian people everywhere, more especially of the United States. Catholics, as well as other Mexicans who are imbued with any degree of patriotism, will welcome any efforts that may be made by the Washington Government and by the American people to help us to reach a solution of the present chaotic situation. But we do not want to see armed intervention.
> Unfortunately, the great moral force of the American Government has not served to improve conditions in Mexico, although we doubt not that President Wilson and his co-laborers acted at all times with conscientiousness. His purpose to maintain the peace of the country and to abstain from actual warfare with Mexico I most heartily indorse, but events have shown that the men who are now at the head of armed forces in Mexico are not capable of establishing an orderly government, and President Wilson should direct his energies toward finding a solution otherwise than through the present disorganized and, in some cases, anarchic forces so ruthlessly ruling various sections of the republic.

Meantime the Protestants have taken over the Church of Los Dolores, in Orizaba, three hours by rail from Vera Cruz, and have also opened a school in the former residence of the priests, Los Josephinos.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

Lodge and Immortality

SIR OLIVER LODGE, physicist and president of the London Society of Psychical Research, has declared his belief in the reality of a future life. The world of science turns to him an ear quivering with interest. For Sir Oliver is a scientist par excellence. In his latest work, "The Unknown Guest," Maurice Maeterlinck expresses himself like Lodge. The literary world strains with attention. Maeterlinck is a superb writer.

Two thousand years ago a humble Galilean told of immortality; told of it with incalculably more authority than the two mentioned celebrities dare affect. Do men of to-day need Sir Oliver's knowledge or the Belgian litterateur's pen to convince them of the veracity of that which was said by one who proved himself to be God? It is a bitter evidence of the wide lack of genuine Christianity that the learned and cultured should hang on the words of two mere men in preference to those of Christ.

Anent a future life, the statements of Maeterlinck at most are worth little. He has no stronger argument to back them than the philosophers who went before him. The value of Sir Oliver's view can be better apprised when he publishes the "scientific reasons" which prompted it. Plainly it will do religion no harm, if science actually succeeds in corroborating a primary religious teaching. But assuredly men are doing themselves harm by doubting the survival of personality until science proves that they ought to believe it. Besides, notwithstanding the English knight's certainty that such proof is at hand, it certainly seems to be far distant.

That wonderful psychic phenomena are constantly taking place, our own James H. Hyslop has kept us Americans well informed, as did Professor William James before him, and as will countless other scholars after him. But, before we attribute such doings to discarnate souls, it must be conclusively demonstrated that they are not attributable to natural causes. And the high complexity of man's nerval and psychical make-up seems wonderful enough to explain many of the ghostly wonders which researchers prefer; if accurately and completely understood it could probably clarify all, or mostly all. The brain, with its millions of neurons, each with its cylinder axis and dendrites, each with its gemmules—such subtility bids us appreciate the immense relation of the slightest physical shock to man's psychical constitution and the facility with which abnormal states of mind may arise; the possibility of unlimited sub-consciousness and even unconscious influence; the sweep of vagaries and the confusion of images. Truly, self is the solution of prodigies. And our present knowledge of self is, at best, very far from complete. If our scientists would finish with the world of men before they plunge into that of spirits, we could conscientiously give them more credence.

It appears, however, that they think they have quite vanquished the visible world. Like the Macedonian of old, they look for a new realm to conquer. The infinitesimality which the microscope has brought into science's ken, the tremendous distances which the telescope has opened to her eye, the wireless mystery of which she has become mistress, all these tend to imbue her with the belief that further advance into the region of the supersensible is feasible; in fact, that communication with souls is not a chimera. But why does she not realize that, in proportion to her departure from the sensible, she incurs the uncertain, and approaches the unknowable! What biologist but finds more mystery in a single cell than he would ever have dreamed of, if the microscope had never been invented! Astronomers have got to Neptune, but they are nonplussed at Mars. The knowledge of ether which physicists lack would fill libraries. And yet science thinks to pass the flammantia mœnia mundi and penetrate the supernatural world—to bring spirits at her beck! No; science has not yet reached the end of an atom, much less the beginning of a spirit. It is pathetic that our savants, knowing so much, should be so imprudent, and that, knowing so little, they should be so proud.

"To honor science," Münsterberg has the frankness and courage to say, "is to respect her limitations: she is not and can not be, and ought never to try to be, an expression of ultimate reality." If men are as honest with themselves as the German professor herein is with them, they will admit that, with regard to the existence of a future life, science makes more promises than she at present can, or is ever likely to, fulfil.

Indeed, up to date, she has given no stronger argument for immortality than would have been offered had she never existed. True, spiritism presents us with a bouquet of wonders. But such marvels used to sprout long before the Fox girls of New York saw fit to cultivate them for "religious" purposes. Tertullian, back in the third century, tells us of séances, "table-rappings," materializations of the souls of the dead—and fraud. Saint Augustine, whose mind was somewhat bigger than those about us to-day, held the simple and altogether sensible opinion that prodigies take place in opposition not to law, but to our ignorance of law. A good indication that he was right is that the more science progresses, the more the occult recedes. Our knowledge of ether and hypnotism has driven away not a few spirits; it will be interesting to see whether Sir Oliver's promised "scientific reasons" will bring them back.

If the authenticity of only one post-mortem visit were established beyond parley by science, and if the uncanny visitant proved his identity beyond a doubt, scientists could rightly claim a conclusive argument for immortality. Down through the ages phantoms have "gibbered and squeaked"; and nowadays, since spiritism became a fad, they are said to be making more noise than ever. Raupert, the Catholic researcher, attributes such manifestations to diabolical agencies. If he is right, then the task of proving immortality, which science has set itself, is hopeless. If he is wrong, it is for science to accomplish the Herculean task of sweeping away the great doubts and difficulties which cluster thick on all spiritualistic evidence.

The alleged messages from the spirit-land are, for the most part, drivelling and inane. But that spirits actually come from the Great Beyond to inform us, their wretched brethren incarcerated in the flesh, about "jack-knives, skull-caps and pen-holders," seasoning their nonsense with an occasional and accidental bit of trivial truth, is too junky for even the most unsqueamish to swallow. Though fact is science, no one cares to eat of "the insane root that takes the reason prisoner."

Can we conceive of broad-browed Aristotle retracing his course on the "darksome bourn," to bring unto mind-weakened mortals the painful platitude that "perseverance triumphs"? The spirit of Bossuet, it is reported, talks such puerile things that even a bumpkin would be ashamed thereof. Corneille's poetry, as transmitted per medium, has degenerated into amazing doggerel. Surely, if the other world possesses no better beings than "Prince Ouran," "Pelham," and "Rector" (celebrated "controls"), we had better relinquish the desire for a future life; for anything is preferable to an association with such insanity. It is into such a mad-house that Sir Oliver would lead us. Thank God, Christ has promised us better things!

The intelligence of spirit-messages is notoriously in inverse ratio to the ignorance of mediums. The souls of the world's greatest men frequently talk like street-gamins; when they are invoked by a medium of parts, however, their diction is of a much better order. This would show that the medium himself or herself is guiltier of the message than any spirit.

Your average medium is a bundle of nerves. High sensitiveness is, of course, a primary requisite for communion with supersensible realities, but also a property which resides in debilitated, sickly bodies. Such give rise to no end of queer mental states. Science lays too little stress on this important truth. Besides, mediums are generally too clever for scientists. To many people, the fact that a Crookes, a Tyndall, a Humboldt, a James, and a Lodge have professed communication with the other world is irrefutable evidence that they have done so. But, as Münsterberg observes, men used to the plain truths of a laboratory, are very apt to be blind to the deceptions outside one. Nature plays no pranks; mediums do. A realization that marvels are a matter of bread and butter to mediums should give our savants a very long and careful pause.

After all, the great hindrance to a scientific demonstration of life after death seems to be the very method by which science hopes to effect such demonstration: spiritism. For spiritism is an Acheronian stream whose miasmatic fumes overcome those who approach, slowly and subtly rob them of right reason, and render them useless to the science which they purposed to enrich. It is an enchantress, a hypnotist, that sways with ever-increasing facility such minds as submit. The illustrious Lombroso is a sorry example of its spell. One has but to read his fervid last work to see how science may be marred by obsession. We naturally wonder whether Sir Oliver's case is not a repetition of Lombroso's.

Thought, especially in the form of dream or hallucination, has always been a puzzle to man. It is inevitable that, even from scholars, it should frequently receive a supernatural interpretation. But the age of witches is no more, which shows a very significant decrease in this frequency. And there is every reason to hold, even in blindness to such a scientific light as Lodge, that progress in psychological knowledge will so elucidate the strangeness of secondary personality as to close the age of mediums. Even our present limited knowledge of this natural, though abnormal phenomenon, suffices to indicate not that the door of another world has been opened, but that the door of new psycho-pathological institutes (not to say lunatic-asylums) needs to be opened.

Sir Oliver, for a modern scientist, is happily unique. Unlike the masters of Bunsen-burners and oxyhydrogen blow-pipes, he has not foolishly and incongruously torn God from the skies. But it is to be feared that his damage to religion will exceed his services, if he persists in spreading a view of immortality, so favorable to so questionable and dangerous a doctrine as spiritism. Every one knows that the more serious spiritistic communications are often both immoral and blasphemous.

But the intense and wide-spread interest in a future life, as evinced by the zest with which the assertions of the English physicist and the Belgian scribe are being followed at a time when the unspeakable European catastrophe could justly be expected wholly to occupy men's minds, is a sign at once healthy and consoling. For a long time men, with various material schemes, have been so busy building their heaven on earth that they have given little thought or care to the ultimate future. In the European upheaval, however, they see their hand-made paradise crumbling and crashing away. In distraction and despair they are fleeing to scholars' promises for comfort. How much more solace they would receive if they would only revert to Christ! It should not be difficult to make them understand this. Now is the psychological moment for God's priests strongly to urge evangelical claims; for men's minds, keen with the strenuous exercise of modern thought, and their hearts, yearning more than ever for things eternal, are precisely in the state to acknowledge and accept the Truth. The united efforts of the clergy should be powerful enough to supersede even so towering an authority as Sir Oliver Lodge's, and to exalt the Galilean above mercenary mediums and reported spirits. In this is a labor of love which will be rewarded a hundredfold.

EDWARD F. MURPHY, M.A.

A Polyglot Diocese

IF St. Luke could take his stand in the diocese of Pittsburgh to-day, he might well apply to it the words he used in the Acts of the Apostles in reference to Jerusalem on the Feast of Pentecost: "There were dwelling there devout men out of every nation under heaven." And the sacred writer's description of the amazement of the multitude, "Because that every man heard them speak in his own tongue," is still verified in the ten counties of Western Pennsylvania, where the inspired utterances of the great Evangelist are read Sunday after Sunday to the assembled congregations in no fewer than seventeen languages. In addition to this, many different dialects are used, some of them almost rising to the dignity of a separate tongue. Every quarter of the world has sent its representatives. There are English and Germans, French and Belgians and Italians, Slovaks and Poles, Slovenians and Croatians, Bohemians and Russians, Bulgarians and Lusatians, Lithuanians and Magyars, Rumanians and Syrians. It does not seem an exaggeration to say that Pittsburgh is the Pentecostal diocese of America. We have Catholics all the way from the frozen steppes of Siberia to the burning sands of the Sahara, and far beyond; from China, Egypt, Arabia and the Islands of the Pacific, from pagan India and infidel Turkey, from Catholic Spain and Protestant England. Any Sunday morning in the majestic cathedral at Pittsburgh, for instance, one can see dusky negroes lisping the quaint dialects of the sunny South, almond-eyed Japanese from the far-away gardens of Nagasaki, and olive-skinned Castilians from the blushing vine hills of their own delightful Spain. There are freshly-baptized Jews from the local tobacco factories on Center Avenue, as well as Syrians, speaking the self-same language as Christ Himself, and who were Catholics at a time when history seems just emerging from the night of antiquity. There are well-groomed American converts, impetuous and eager in their new-found faith, but who, as yet, have had no opportunity to suffer for their religion, while they worship side by side with Catholic immigrants from southeastern Europe, swarthy men, with military tread, and muscles of iron, whose history is bathed in glory, for it was their sires that saved Europe from the Turk, drenching the fairest plains of the earth with their heart's blood that the Cross of Christ might be unfurled as the standard of western civilization. It is not for nothing that the Slav wears the Cross publicly on his coat, for he has been in very truth the Athlete of Christ.

Including the Slavs of the Greek Ruthenian Rite, nearly 300,000 Catholics in the diocese of Pittsburgh do not say their prayers or go to Confession in English. In other words, about three-fifths of the diocese speak a foreign language, for the latest issue of the "Catholic Directory" gives the Catholic population as 500,000. Among these half a million Catholics there are, according to statistics published recently by Bishop Canevin, 70,000 Italians; 65,000 Poles; 45,000 Slovaks of the Latin Rite; 8,000 Lithuanians; 8,000 Croatians; 6,000 Slovenians; 4,000 Magyars; 4,000 Bohemians; 2,000 Belgians and French; 2,000 Rumanians; 1,500 Syrians, and 30,000 Greek Ruthenians.

In proportion to the total negro population, there are few cities in the country having a larger proportion of Catholic negroes than Pittsburgh. There are 18 Italian parishes and 6 Italian missions, in charge of 22 Italian priests. There are also 78 separate parishes and 25 missions for the various Slavonic races, in charge of 112 priests. Many priests of the diocese must be able to speak four, five and six languages and dialects, in order to take care of their many-tongued flocks. Every seminarian training to become a priest of the diocese is required to learn, as an integral part of his course, either Italian or one of the Slovak tongues.

The difficulties encountered in thus preaching the Gospel in the diocese are paralleled only by the labors of the early Apostles of Christianity. The many thousands of immigrants working in the coal mines and at the coke ovens, and in places far distant from established churches, have imposed a gigantic burden on the bishop and priests of the diocese. To make due provision for their spiritual welfare, and to instruct the children in their religion, the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine has been splendidly organized and officered. It is a body of the laity, old men and young, maidens and matrons, under the direction of the clergy, who go out into the remote villages and hamlets on Sunday afternoons searching for Catholics, gathering in the children and adults, teaching them catechism, and preparing them for the sacraments. In many instances their work results in the organization of a flourishing parish, and the erection of a church and school. These lay missionaries now have under instruction over 4,000 children in this diocese, who would otherwise be lost entirely to the Faith. To equip the teachers for their work properly, a school for catechists has been established, with a graded course of two years, leading to a diploma. If Christianity flourishes in after years in Pittsburgh, no small measure of its progress will be due to the energy and zeal and generous sacrifices which these devoted lay missionaries are making to spread the kingdom of God on earth. May their number increase!

Conditions in one parish may be cited as typical of the obstacles encountered and overcome by sheer hard work and everlasting persistency. It stretches for eleven miles up and down the river, along both banks, comprising ten different villages and hamlets, in which more than fifteen languages are spoken. In one locality the office of the mine superintendent serves as the Sunday school room; at another village the kitchen of a dwelling is used as the place of assemblage; at a third point, no building at all being available, the zealous pastor may be seen in favorable weather on the banks of the flowing river, a few inches from the water's edge, instructing his youthful flock, as did St. Paul when he met Lydia and her companions on his first European missionary journey. At a fourth place a stable is used, and the hospitable beasts of the field again give room, even as they did to Christ Himself, on the first chilly Christmas night at Bethlehem long centuries ago.

So striking are the resemblances, that it is not such a far cry after all from Jerusalem and the days of the Apostles, to their successors, the zealous bishop, priests and people, "devout men out of every nation under heaven," who, in this twentieth century are obeying literally the command to "teach all nations" in this polyglot diocese of the western world.

THOMAS F. COAKLEY, D.D.

End of the World? Not Yet!

To the Editor of AMERICA:

If I presume not, may I ask you to publish an article on the fulfilment of the prophecy of our Lord as recorded in St. Matthew, chapter xxiv? The portents that distress us to-day: wars, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions: the corruption in the body politic, the unrest and dissatisfaction among different peoples, seem to point to the fulfilment of this prophecy. And if St. Matthew is read in conjunction with Second Thessalonians, chapter ii, the conviction gains force. A certain noted "Pastor" is forever preaching on this subject with a dogmatism that is leaving an impression on many minds. For this second reason an article in AMERICA would be valuable.

New York. H. F. O.

WITH the unexpectedness of the deluge, of a thief in the night, and of a snare, will the event of final doom crash upon the listless world. These parallels, sketched by the Evangelist, are three distinct comparisons emphasized by Our Lord Himself, whose words the Gospel mirrors. And yet there are those who seek the year and the day and the hour; pseudo "Pastors" who point out the time with minutest precision; false prophets who would entice us to believe that God has taken them into His confidence, and revealed to them all that is worth knowing. As if the deluge might be caught in a reservoir! As if the midnight thief were to come courteously announced! As if the snare could be detected and labeled before it is set—and then advertised!

But do not the portents of the day breed terror? Ten nations engage in colossal warfare. Earthquakes and volcanic eruptions shake the pillars of the earth. There is unrest in the body politic, while the murmurings of dissatisfaction between capital and labor are ills that rack the industrial and social fabric in a manner for the present irremediable. Some, indeed, are terrorized, but terror is prejudicial both to reason and to faith. It was to calm this state of mind in the Apostles, and to correct a false judgment underlying it, that our Lord once passed in review calamities such as these and disrobed the whole category of anything approaching even a remote necessary connection, save one of priority, with the date and day of judgment. Wars and rumors of wars, strife among nations, seditions, pestilences, famines, frightful sights and great prodigies from heaven were designated by Him as "the beginning of sorrows"—"the beginning" not in a chronological sense, but in the order of intensity. These are the things that "must needs be" (Mark xiii, 7), and every century has its share of them.

One degree above this material "beginning," or least of sorrows, is the moral hatred, the political and social persecution to be meted out to the elect because of their adhesion to Christ. Higher still rank scandals, mutual hatred and reciprocal betrayals within the body of the faithful. Next come defections and apostacies, false prophets and the deception of many, as by schism or heresy; while the climax is reached in the doleful comment on religious indifference: "because iniquity aboundeth, the charity of many will grow cold." (Matt. xxiv, 6, 12.) In what epoch of Church history are not all these evils chronicled as facts? They are in the mystical body of Christ, the mystery of the cross and the stigmata luring stalwart souls through faith to the top of the narrow way. But as Christ has given it to be understood "the end is not yet." In St. Paul's conception much still remains to be made up through the sufferings of the saints for what is wanting in the Passion of Christ.

Why, then, be alarmed at the magnitude of the present war or the complicated character of social relations, since turmoil and travailing are inseparable from racial as from individual expansion? This is a point toward which history, philosophy, science and the doctrine of original sin must ever converge. The paramount difference between the present and the past lies at bottom in unprecedented material growth, and in this, as in every form of progress, the influence of Christ's admonition is a steadying one: "See that ye be not troubled." "He that shall persevere to the end shall be saved." (Matt. xxiv, 6, 13.)

The phrase, "to the end," expresses an extreme or consummation of perseverance. Just as the enumeration of specific ills which, historically, occur either simultaneously or in rotary order and succession, serves chiefly to show that our Lord knew what He was talking about when He bade His listeners to "take heed" and let "no man deceive them," so the accumulation of these ills is described "beforehand" to furnish some idea of the extent and height and depth to which their patience, fortitude and magnanimity must go. Perseverance must place them on a pinnacle that will remain unshaken amidst the fiercest shocks, and being, as it is, the indispensable condition of each individual's salvation, it is far more worthy of their reflection and ambitions than the cosmic mysteries of God's providence with which they were unduly preoccupied. "If, therefore, they shall say to you (at any time): 'Behold, he is in the desert,' go ye not out: 'Behold in the closets,' believe it not. For as the lightning cometh forth from the east, and appeareth even unto the west, so will also the coming of the Son of man be." Instantaneousness and visibility will be its preeminent characteristics. (Matt. xxiv, 3, 26, 27.)

tion of a series of tribulations to be ages long, and uniting alpha with omega as intervening letters in a huge but finite scheme. Meanwhile, the Gospel will be preached to all nations and will strike root in the hearts of the meek. The monstrous guillotine of the heedless world, the ruthless machinations of Antichrist, will be prolific in bloody slaughters, but these will augur only, as the rainbow did of old, that something heavenly, something like the luxuriance of a sub-tropical "summer is nigh, even at the doors." Such is the sacred symbolism of the fig-tree. A newer covenant is thus sealed in the Gospel kingdom with its prodigies of perseverance and the hope of personal redemption. (Matt. xxiv, 32, 33.)

It is "immediately" after the completed cycle of "those days" that "the sun will be darkened, and the moon will not give her light, and the stars will fall from heaven; and the powers of heaven will be shaken." This graphic description need have no reference to astronomical disturbances, as may be seen in the Old Testament, where the same highly-charged metaphors are applied by Isaias to the fall of Babylon, by Ezechiel to the destruction of Egypt, and by Joel to the much-mooted locust-plague. What the passage really imports to us is an emphatic and absolute suppression of any hint as to how many hundreds of thousands of "those days" are to elapse before the cycle will be over! One thing is certain. The present "generation," begotten of Christ through grace, will last till the "end of time," when the cycle will cease; and then the re-generation in glory at the second coming will occur; but "of that day and hour no one knoweth, not the angels in heaven, but the Father alone." It may even eventuate that, as at the Deluge and the Incarnation, "the times of the gentiles" shall have tired men of war and caused them to settle down to universal peace and voluptuousness. Thus will they be found "eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage," till the Son of Man will come and "take them all away." (Matt. xxiv, 29, 34, 36-39.)

Hence the momentous lesson that has resounded unceasingly from the time of its first utterance until now: "Be ye also ready, because at what hour ye know not the Son of Man will come. . . . Blessed is that servant whom his lord, when he cometh, will find watching." (Matt. xxiv, 42, 44, 46.)

Whenever sensational doctrines are drawn from our Lord's words by reputed "Pastors" or "Evangelists," it is only an indication of unsound faith, absence of authority, or the need of being taught. A colloquy with the Thessalonians is then in order. That people also once thought "the day of the Lord at hand." They were deceived, and the Apostle rebuked them for having forgotten things "he had told them of" before. Among those things was the warning: "Ye yourselves well know that the day of the Lord shall so come as a thief in the night. For when they shall say, 'Peace and security,' then shall sudden destruction come upon them, as pain to a woman with child." (II Thess. ii, 2; I, v, 2, 3.)

In a word, whenever our Saviour was confronted with the idle question of time, He evaded it, or stamped it as impertinent and presumptuous. Even on the day of His Ascension, He reminded His disciples who remained inquisitive to the last: "It is not for you to know the times or the moments, for the Father has chosen to keep such secrets in His own Power." (Acts, i, 7.)

A Humble Suggestion

IN the March Atlantic Monthly a writer who has chosen to remain anonymous utters some thoughts that deserve attention. "Whither?" is the bitter cry of a soul which is sick of materialism, sick of the modern weltanschauung and starving for faith. The words in which the age is indicted for its blindness, its deafness, its worship of the flesh, its ignorance, its pride, deserve to be read and pondered, for it is true-talk that they speak. Coming, moreover, at a time when the modern materialist has seen his world smashed and his theory of "Progress and Peace" proved bankrupt over night, when he is wringing his hands and waiting like an hysterical woman over the "horrors" of war that hurt so much, and blaming everything for "failure" except his own philosophy, it should profit him to read these words:

> In the great hush that has fallen upon the nation, is it not well for us to stop and ask anew whither our progress has been tending? What words have those who have been taught to live and breathe and think in terms of matter wherewith to voice this awful stirring of the soul? People cry out that the Dark Ages will come again through this fearful slaughter, this waste of resource, intellectual and spiritual. Have not the Dark Ages been with us for decades? For mankind, more and more stripped of the deeper faith, the larger hope, more and more cut off from the finer part of his own nature, what darker ages can there be than these shadowed by the dreary positivism, undiscussed and undefined, but merely assumed, of our day? Many a thinker must see, in this present awful crisis, not an isolated phenomenon, not a mere political event for which a train of political causes had been laid but also one of the natural results of our ways of thinking, of our kind of progress. The growth of material over spiritual conception in the last fifty years is appalling; to such an end the Gospel of the Perfect Brute legitimately tends. (Italicization mine).

It is an accurate diagnosis acutely made. We have the Dark Ages with us now, here and now, with our Edison, our Darwin, our telephones, our wireless telegraphy, and all! And the darkness is in the "positivism, undiscussed and undefined but merely assumed"—a very superstition of positivism in fact—into which men have fallen. Was ever so besotted a superstition epidemic before in the history of men's thought?

It is babbled in the nurseries—or almost so; it is certainly chattered in the schools. It is assumed almost a priori among those who make pretence of—shall I say?—at least, suburban culture. And, of course, it is de rigueur with all who rank themselves above that grade on the intellectual scale. And the joke is that its victims complacently regard themselves as "rebels," modestly drape the mantle of "courage" round their shoulders and turn an undaunted face toward a world which thinks as they do! They "boldly defy" a public opinion which applauds them! They "bravely abandon" beliefs which even the "man in the street" has learned to call "outworn creeds," and the multitude visualizes itself, each one, standing in the bare isolation of honest intellectual integrity, calmly fronting the heavens with folded arms, mute—oh, no! not mute, but vociferously assuring heaven and earth that he "can no otherwise." Rebels, forsooth! It would take Dean Swift himself to do justice to them.

I wish to offer a suggestion to our Catholic colleges which came to my mind after reading the article from which I have quoted, and the making of which is the purpose of this article.

My suggestion is this—that they should unite in offering a prize, to be competed for annually, for the best statement and refutation of the case against the Catholic religion on "scientific" grounds, or, as the writer above quoted would put it, on positivistic grounds. The prize should be large enough to attract writers of "mature" mind, to the end that all possible arguments should be brought into action. After some five or ten years the winning papers should be carefully collated, and the case built up against the Church should be carefully examined again with a view to a more complete refutation, if this be required.

If such a case so made and so answered would not flutter the "rebel" dove-cotes—from the "intellectual" heights down to the day-schools—I am badly "mistook in my judgments." A more direct method of dispelling some of the fog of this particular superstition does not occur to me. Why not hang out our shield at the tent-door? Why not ask people to give a reason for the unfaith that is in them. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

The Forward March of Russia

THE study of race-growths is interesting in these days, when the destinies of nations are being fought out on two battle lines, each stretching across Europe. One of the most significant results of such a study is a realization of the colossal proportions which Russia assumes on the ethnological map of Europe. The subjoined table, showing the increase of population in the principal countries of Europe, in the period between 1480 and 1900, leads to some highly suggestive conclusions:

	Population in 1480	in 1780	in 1900
England	3,700,000	9,561,000	41,220,000
France	12,600,000	25,100,000	38,800,000
Germany	800,000	5,460,000	56,000,000
Spain	8,000,000	9,960,000	18,000,000
Russia	2,100,000	26,800,000	111,800,000
Austria-Hungary	9,500,000	20,200,000	47,100,000
Italy	9,200,000	12,800,000	32,000,000

These figures, which are compiled by a Slavic ethnologist, Rudolph Vrba, indicate the dominant importance of Russia as an ethnological factor in the great struggle of the races to survive. And this increase in the population of Russia has been achieved in the face of a rate of infant mortality that is the highest to be found in the vital statistics of the nations of Europe—45 per thousand to 32 in Germany, 20 in Great Britain and 18 in France. Even at this rate of waste of human life, Russia has shown for the past decade an average excess of 1,700,000 births over deaths—an increase unparalleled by any of the great nations of Europe. The inevitable introduction of sanitation, the elimination of the periodical famines which are a feature of Russian life even to-day, and the establishment of higher standards of material well-being than those now prevalent in the empire of the north, could easily double the rate of growth shown by the statistics of the Russian census-takers.

If the battle of Teutoburg, in which Varus lost his legions at the hands of the German tribesmen, was a decisive event in history, marking the beginning of the decline of Roman military power; if the battles of Trafalgar and Waterloo demonstrated that the world was to be largely English; if the surrender of Napoleon III registered the verdict of destiny against French domination of Europe, the birth statistics of Russia might well rank with these events as an indication of race-domination by sheer increase in numbers. If the white race, in the light of the past two centuries, is destined to rule and populate all the continents with the possible exception of Asia, the question of the future mastery of the world, with the exception of America, becomes ominous in view of the prolific increase in the population of Russia, already the most numerous white race in existence.

Nor is the population of Russia itself the sole resource of Russian nationalism. Into the plans of the Russian empire builders enters a large auxiliary population of Slavs, aggregating more than fifty millions, self-governing or constituting parts of the German and Austro-Hungarian empires. These nations, whom Russian statesmen regard as an ultimate part and parcel of the Russian host, are the Bohemians, the Poles, the Croatians, the Servians, Slovaks, Slovenes and Bulgarians. Since the middle of the nineteenth century, through the medium of the Slavic Benevolent Association of Moscow, Russia has been conducting a vigorous and enterprising campaign of education among all these peoples, impressing upon them the doctrine which the Russians have designated as the Panslavistic movement, but which in all its essential features is a vast project for propagating and strengthening Russian influence over all the other Slavic nations with a view to a future absorption.

In order to understand the methods of Russian propaganda, it should be kept in mind that Russian nationalism is closely bound up with the Russian Church. From the outset of its activities the Slavic Benevolent Society of Moscow took on a distinctly religious and especially anti-Catholic character. It aimed to bring up Slavic youth from foreign countries to be Orthodox as well as Russian. It set its face firmly against any form of dissent, whether in the direction of Lutheranism or Catholicism. Thus, in 1876, when the Bulgarian people, then still under Turkey, had broken with the Patriarch of Constantinople and had entered into negotiations with the Vatican in what is known as the "Uniat" movement, the Benevolent Association, now centered in St. Petersburg, and known as the Slavic Benevolent Association of St. Petersburg, expended millions of roubles in a successful effort to prevent the proposed transfer of allegiance from the Eastern Rite to the Western, of a people who could no longer endure the exploitations of the ignorant and rapacious Greek hierarchy.

By this time the methods of the Association, which included among its membership all the high officials of the empire and enjoyed the open patronage of the Czar, Alexander II, had become undisguisedly ecclesiastical. A study of the annual balances of the association, as published in the Russian Encyclopedia, shows that three-fourths of the expenditures of the organization were devoted to the building or repair of Orthodox Churches outside of Russia, to the publication of church books for non-Russian Slavs, to the support of missionaries, many of whom were sent to Galicia, Slavonia, Croatia and Bosnia-Herzegovina, where the population is largely Catholic. The Abyssinian mission, with its alluring invitation to the Coptic Church to give its adherence to the Holy Russian Synod, is a conspicuous instance of a feverish religious propaganda which has dotted the entire Near East with Russian Churches, shrines and chapels, established and supported with funds from St. Petersburg..

Bulgaria, Servia, Montenegro and the Austrian provinces furnished the chief fields for this proselytizing endeavor. The Bulgarians, however, proved inapt pupils, because of their antagonism to religious or political dictation from St. Petersburg. Accordingly, after they had refused, at the end of their victorious war against Turkey in 1912, to accept Russia's mandate and surrender to Servia the Bulgarian territory in Macedonia which had been conceded to Bulgaria under the terms of the ante-bellum treaty with Servia, the Bulgarians were solemnly read out of the Slavic race and were denounced in the official press of St. Petersburg as Tartars and heretics.

Since 1912, the Russian Orthodox propaganda has been largely abandoned in Bulgaria. But it was continued with redoubled energy in the Austrian provinces and in Servia. One of the sinister events which shortly preceded the outbreak of the present war was the uncovering of a vast political conspiracy in Galicia under the guise of missionary endeavor. Among the persons arrested and convicted at the trial in Hungary, that followed the disclosures of the police, were several Russian priests and monks who, under the veil of religious instruction among the Catholic Ruthenians, had sown sedition and had sought to lay the foundations of a movement for political union with Russia. Count Vladimir Bobrinsky, a member of the Douma and a former president of the Slavic Benevolent Association, was shown to have been in charge of the movement. He publicly admitted his own connection with the propaganda and confessed that an attempt was made to alienate the Ruthenians from their loyalty to the Catholic Church, although he denied its political character.

One of the striking racial developments of the war has been the refusal of the Austrian Poles to heed the appeal which the Russian Grand Duke Nikolai Nikolaievitch, as commander-in-chief of the Russian armies, made to their race consciousness as a Slavic people. Far from lending their aid to the Russians, the Poles have remained loyal to the Austrian empire, and many of those who have been captured in the course of the operations in Galicia are expiating their loyalty in exile in Siberia—an exile which has lost none of its horrors despite the professed reforms in Russian administrative and punitive methods.

The opposition of the Poles to Russian rule is the outcome of their bitter memories of religious proscription on the Russian side of the frontier, where the use of the Polish language in public has been repeatedly made a penal offence and the Catholic faith, the historic faith of all the Poles, has again and again felt the heavy hand of persecution, even in this century. The Austrian Poles have learned from experience that religious persecution is repugnant to the spirit of Austria's civilization. Their continued adherence to the political organisms of which they are a self-governing part furnishes a convincing demonstration of the deeply intolerant character of Russian administration —an administration which has spared no effort, either of force or cajolery, in its age-old campaign against the Catholic Church. Perhaps better than any other race which has come under the widespread activities of the Russian propaganda, the Poles know that political subjection to Russia means religious subjection to the Russian church. Neither have the Poles forgotten the slight value of any Russian pledge of religious or political liberty.

The military operations of Russia are now frankly directed at the acquisition of Constantinople, the city which rivaled Rome as the religious capital of the world. Something of Russia's religious fervor for the capture of the ancient metropolis of Constantine can be learned from the fact that in 1877, when the Russian army was warned away from Constantinople by Great Britain at the end of the Russo-Turkish war, the Czar's soldiers wept at the sight of the forbidden domes of St. Sophia. Now another Czar is making a new and far more likely attempt to seize Constantinople, with its traditions of church leadership and mastery. If he succeeds, the Orthodox Church, blown to a white heat, will begin a fresh and far more ambitious campaign of proselytism. A challenge to Rome for the spiritual leadership of the world would not be improbable in view of the intense spirit of Russian Orthodoxy. EDWARD A. RUMELY.

Williams Reads St. Thomas

"WHAT is that ancient lore you have in your hands so much of late?" said Williams to my Uncle Dion, as the priest waved him to the vacant armchair before the blazing hearth in the cozy rectory library.

"That," answered the amiable, kindly-eyed pastor of Farnsborough, fondling the dog-eared volume on his knees, "is the 'Secunda Secundæ,' the brightest particular gem in the crown of him who bridged heaven and earth and exalted human reason to the stars: St. Thomas of Aquin, Prince of Theologians and Glory of the Middle Ages."

This was the old man's season for St. Thomas, for he was professedly a man of three books—the Bible, Shakespere and the "Summa Theologica"—a trilogy which he had been reading in unbroken rotation for forty years. "In the Book of books" he used to say, "I read the ways of God with men and hear His voice; in the pages of the master dramatist I read the ways of man with men and study the history of the human heart written in a manner unsurpassed elsewhere in profane literature, while in St. Thomas I find the great synthesis—Humanity reconciled to Divinity, and Divinity made intelligible to Humanity."

"Middle Ages, eh," sniffed Williams, with just that dash of deliberate cynicism which he knew would surely provoke their regular Friday night discussion. "Dry as dust, then, I suppose."

My Uncle Dion paused before answering, just long enough to produce from somewhere among the folds of his soutane a goodly-sized bone snuff-box, curiously intagliated and bound with tarnished silver. "Dry? Maybe," he answered, gazing reflectively off into space for a moment, and delivering on the end of the box the preliminary tap after the fashion of all orthodox snuff-takers. "But so is the dust of diamonds and the king of metals, unalloyed gold." Here a generous pinch of his favorite "Highland Heather" was duly transferred from the tip of thumb and forefinger to those innermost penetralia where dwelt his own, genial, intellectual self. "You know," he added, again fumbling for his soutane pocket, "you used to call the Bible dry until you really read the text for the first time last year, instead of Dr. Eliot's latest theory or Professor Puffendorf's most recent conjecture."

There was a mild asperity in his voice now—if, indeed, the mellow tones of my Uncle Dion could ever be so qualified—and there was certainly a hint of gentle triumph, too, that was not lost on the visitor. Williams smiled.

"Hoist with my own petard," he admitted gallantly, for he was an honest sceptic, though at times an ironical one. A graduate of a quarter of a century before from a well-known State University, he was, as a natural consequence, a philosophic waif and a theological iconoclast, thus proving a worthy foil for the priestly zeal and shepherd-like instincts of my Uncle Dion, who, for his part, was as orthodox as the penny catechism. The spiritual nakedness of this otherwise cultured, sensitive and finely-moulded soul had gone as straight to the old saint's heart as did the poverty and material distress down by the railroad; while Williams in turn, though living at opposite poles of thought, had been as spontaneously attracted to this unassuming rural dean. And well he might be, for my Uncle Dion was one of those ruddy-cheeked, white-haired heralds of Faith, Hope and Charity such as Mother Church alone seems able to perpetuate. Hence this strange comradeship.

"Well, then," resumed Williams, in the half-bantering, half-serious tone under which he usually hid his desire for enlightenment, "if your St. Thomas is such an oracle, what does he say to this latest enigma that is plaguing the minds of religious derelicts like myself." Here he drew the evening paper from his pocket, found two paragraphs which he had previously underlined and read them aloud: "A Belgian priest was found after the bombardment, wandering aimlessly among the smoking ruins of his parish church and muttering incoherently about 'the God who failed.' He was led away tenderly to the nearest hospital." Williams lowered the paper for a stealthy glance over the top. No answer from across the hearth-rug. He read the second item, an extract from the letter of an Englishman to his sister, September 9, 1914:

> At the present time the dogmatic religionists would be better employed in considering the failure of Christianity. The spectacle of the Christian peoples fighting each other like savages, and each calling upon God to help them, and believing that God is helping them in their atrocities, would be ludicrous but for the pain and misery and horrors entailed. We have had two thousand years of Christianity, and the result is so bad that perhaps humanity will begin to see the futility of priest-ridden religion for progress and civilization. Let us consider humanity, and leave priestcraft and church-craft alone.

There was real challenge in the reader's voice when he finished, for the paradoxes of Christianity were an old stumbling-block to him as they were to the Greeks and Romans before him. "There is my gauntlet," he concluded, dropping the folded newspaper on the rug between the two chairs. "Will your St. Thomas take it up?"

My Uncle Dion had remained absolutely motionless during the reading and the subsequent impassioned tirade. It was the fall of Williams' battle-gauge that finally startled him into activity. His hand dropped mechanically to his pocket, out came the snuff-box, which was gently tapped as usual, the pinch extracted, the box restored—all in silence. But the apathy was only external. His mind was racing through the pages of St. Thomas. At last he spoke:

"Your Englishman was, doubtless, a hyper-sensitive soul thrown off his balance by scenes of unwonted suffering. But unlike the Belgian curé, he was not properly administered to, and so has retrograded some fifteen or sixteen centuries and gone over to the Manichæans with their panic philosophy. Now let me see," he continued meditatively, turning the pages of the "Summa," . . . "War, strife, bloodshed and the rest. It ought to come somewhere in the Christian virtues and their opposites." He stopped at the Fortieth Question of the "Secunda Secundæ," and began to expound the three conditions which St. Thomas postulates to justify a recourse to arms, viz.:—legitimate authority, a just cause, and a right intention on the part of the belligerents.

"But what if I admit all that," interposed Williams, after listening for a few moments. "I have been reading that literature you lent me: AMERICA, The Catholic Mind and the rest. . . . It is not the ethics of war that gives me pause; it is the ethics of your God that appals me."

"Tut! Tut!" replied my Uncle Dion with a deprecatory motion, "we are coming to that directly. I had first to burn some bridges behind you. Your chief quarrel then, is with the Providence of God, is it not?" The old man had another volume on his knees by this time—the first part of the "Summa." He opened it to the Twenty-first and Twenty-second Questions, where with characteristic terseness, clearness and profundity, St. Thomas discusses the tremendous problem of physical and moral evil in their relation to the Mercy and Providence of God. He construed the Latin as follows:

> There are two orders to be observed in Nature; one by which creatures are governed among themselves, as for example when parts are ordained to form a whole, accidents fitted to substances, and every completed unit directed unto its proper end. The other order is that by which all created things are referred to God. . . . These orders differ so essentially that disorders which may be tolerated in one can never happen in the other. Particular orders may be disturbed, but the universal, never. There is a world of difference, therefore, between the conduct of him who has the care of some particular order and Him Who in His right hand conserves the order of the entire universe. The guardian of the particular rightly strives to exclude all disarrangements and deformities from the sphere of his jurisdiction; but not so that universal ruler, who may, in virtue of his eminent sovereignty, permit great deordinations, even cataclysms, in some particular order, to the end that the greater good of the universal be not impeded. . . . For by the corruption of one creature another is often generated and so species are preserved. Now, God is that universal custodian of all creation, hence, in His Providence, He at times permits grave evils to afflict individuals or groups of dividuals for the sake of the greater good of the entire organization. For if all evils were anticipated or removed from the world, great good would be prevented, too. The king of beasts lives only by the slaughter of other animals, nor should we have the heroic virtues of the martyrs if we had not the persecutions of tyrants.

"There is much deep reasoning there," said Williams, quick to appreciate the pregnant content of the passage. "But your St. Thomas has not much comfort for the heart of humanity; he speaks only to the intellect."

"On the contrary," answered my Uncle Dion, "there is much essential poetry hidden in this philosophy, if we will merely paraphrase it.

"For St. Thomas warns us here that you and I, and kings and princes, and tribunes and chancellors and statesmen, and—paupers, are, all of us, but so many players in a gigantic drama, more than world-wide, in which the protagonist is God. Nations, as well as individuals, have their parts, their lines, their entrances and exits. But simply and precisely because the setting of this drama is wider even than this wide world, embracing all that swims in ether—planets, suns and star-dust—and extending through time up to the very shores of eternity, no human eye can view it in its entirety, no finite mind grasp its full significance We are limited to our own petty orders, to the brief act or scene in which we live and move and play our part. Even of our own humanity, than which nothing is more intimate to us, we see but fragmentary segments, viewing life as it were through a tapering arch, and hence knowing nothing of what goes on above, below or on either side. No single lump of human clay, no matter how feverish its activities, no, nor the sum total of all the countless generations that have walked this earth, has ever lived all life or solved its every problem! Truly, then, did the poet sing, with perfect imagery:

> Yet all experience is an arch wherethro'
> Gleams that untraveled world, whose margin fades
> Forever and forever when I move.

"But not so with the Eternal Mind. His all-seeing eye sweeps the whole range of created being, for His is the universal charge, not only of this planet, to our slender intellects so stupendous, but of all those mighty systems in one of which this whirling sphere is but a paltry, fifth-rate satellite! The evils then, which are disfiguring a goodly portion of this painful earth to-day may portend naught but chaos and the breakdown of all order, human and divine, to the horror-stricken eye behind the arch, for it sees not the relation these bear to the world-wide organism that lies beyond its ken. The deaths, the bloodshed and destruction that now crowd our little arch of life may mean the very existence, conservation and progress, physically or spiritually, of generations yet unborn.

"In the physical evolution of the individual, there sometimes occur crises when nothing will avail but blood-letting, not the blood of goats and bullocks, but his own. Nations too, may become glutted in body and spiritually impoverished through their pride, greed, luxury, dissipation, irreligion and infidelity. Then comes blood-redemption and the scourge of God. That is admittedly the history of the deluge, of Sodom and Gomorrah, and perhaps in our own days, of St. Pierre in Martinique."

"But," objected Williams, "not all who have suffered greatly have so offended. There are two small nations of Northwestern Europe that straightway rise before one's historical eye in confutation of your theory. Both, I am told, have been passionately devoted to your Catholic ideals, and hence, by that same token, the great masses of the population may be supposed to be guiltless of the deep personal and political corruption which you allege in vindication of the Deity. Yet one of these peoples has been the Niobe of nations for seven centuries, the other for seven fearful months."

"Aye," broke in my Uncle Dion. "I know. And that is Calvary in its two most sacrificial aspects—holocaust and abandonment. As His rain falls on just and unjust, so the arrows of His wrath sometimes find innocent victims. But in such cases they come not as chastisement for sin and disobedience, but as purging fire to precious gold, that that which was pure may be purer still. Vicarious suffering, too, has that never entered into your philosophy? Why man, had the world had no Nero, Caligula and Domitian, where should be that cloud of white-robed witnesses, the ingens multitudo of Tacitus, with their inspiriting heritage for us, the progeny of their souls' travail? Ibant gaudentes! The sands of the Coliseum were empurpled for upwards of three centuries with the best blood of slaughtered saints, but in those pools germinated the seeds of Rome's and the world's redemption. For that thrice-consecrated earth cried to Heaven for vengeance and mercy, and mercy came in the whirlwind of destruction that followed in the wake of Alaric and his Goths. Down crashed the enervated and rotting city of the Cæsars, crumbling into ashes 'neath the chastening fire and sword, only to emerge from the flames, like the fabled Phœnix, rejuvenated and transformed into the City of God, earth's central shrine.

"He brought good from evil then: He is the same God to-day. Messina, San Francisco, Ireland and Belgium had their heroes, known and unknown, and their spiritual triumphs, not less—perhaps even more—than their victims. He is a mighty Alchemist, the Alchemist of the Universe, Who alone is potent to dip poor mankind

> . . . Into the crucible of Time,
> To emerge after long fumes of pain and horror,
> More nearly fused into one Humanity.

or

> Pour blood and burning tears and misery
> And waste and famine out upon the earth,
> Yet in a year or a yoke of years
> Transmute them into human betterment."

There was a considerable pause. Williams was the first to speak: "Your Thomas of Aquin, Prince of Theologians, was an optimist," he said. "You mean he was a saint, which signifies to view all things sub luce æternitatis," answered my Uncle Dion, accompanying his words with a gesture that was as significant of the end of the argument as it was characteristic of your confirmed snuff-taker.

You may remember that he had been balancing that last pinch of snuff between his fingers for almost a quarter of an hour. But like a real connoisseur, he had never lost it, nor his consciousness of it. Up and down it had flitted, backward and foreward through the pages of St. Thomas, now here, now there, but never quite out of his mind. To be sure, there were several moments when it seemed on the verge of being ultimately and properly bestowed, but something always intervened. But now, when all was said and done, he solemnly closed the book, and like an anxious lover detected in some momentary negligence, gazed for a moment half-apologetically at the tips of his fingers; then, on the wings of two long-drawn-out inhalations that betokened exquisite pleasure, he consigned that much-traveled pinch to its last resting-place. COMMUNICATIONS

Catholic Press Association

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It may interest your readers to know that a Catholic Press Association already exists, and has been in full working order for some three or four years. So far as I can ascertain, its activities are limited to syndicating: (1) a weekly cablegram from Rome; (2) a London or European letter of the usual type, and (3) the weekly opinions of "Our Washington Correspondent" on political matters from the Irish-American point of view. It can not be said that very many of our Catholic weeklies accept this service and, it must be confessed, no one can very well blame them. The C. P. A. does not make the slightest attempt to influence the daily press, never bothers to contradict the many egregious errors in the dailies of the city in which its activities are conducted and, in general, it appears to go comfortably to sleep between the dates of its annual conventions. It is, however, significant of the state of our Catholic weeklies that so few people seem to know of the existence of the Catholic Press Association.

New York. A PERFECT FOOL.

A Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It is with special pleasure that I have been following the expressions of opinion given in the columns of AMERICA regarding "That Catholic Daily." It appears to me that the most significant and weighty utterances, thus far, were those of Mr. Michael Williams in the issue of February 13, 1915. I particularly appreciate the emphasis he lays on the fact that a Catholic daily must be endowed, because it is out of competition with the secular press, commercially speaking. It is also "illuminating" to know that a metropolitan daily's cost of production is from $8,000 to $12,000 daily, or some $3,650,000 per year. That's worth knowing. Especially striking is the following sentence: "No Catholic paper can gain a large amount of advertising unless it has a large circulation, and it never will have large circulation, and never ought to have large circulation (in the modern, metropolitan sense of the word 'large') while human nature remains what it is." That certainly should prove an enlightenment to many well-meaning friends of the Catholic daily. In connection with this discussion it is instructive to note the "Program of Practical Press Development and Extension" as it is being expounded to the readers of his three papers, the Catholic Tribune, the Katholischer Western, and the Luxemburger Gazette, by the Editor-in-Chief, Mr. Nicholas Gonner, of Dubuque, Iowa:

> We are adhering firmly to our clearly explained policy of making no leaps or bounds in the dark, but to continue pleading for a natural, steady development, step by step. The next step to be undertaken is, therefore, to ascertain the extent of the support which we may expect in the publication of issues of the Catholic Tribune twice a week, enabling us to issue a Sunday edition to all those readers who are willing to assist. If we can succeed in this effort, we would then furnish, in place of one weekly issue of twelve pages for $2.00 per annum, two semi-weekly issues of eight pages each, or sixteen pages every week, for $3.00 per annum. Such readers as prefer to continue receiving twelve pages once a week, of course, do so. "Success in this case means pointing out, by our example, the way of development for every other Catholic weekly." The semi-weekly publication in question will be undertaken only in case "a reasonably large demand" is made evident by the subscriptions promised in advance.

Does it not appear that Mr. Gonner's policy of steady development should commend itself for the safeness and soundness of the manner of procedure he advocates?

State Support for Schools Undesirable

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Would you permit me to enter a protest against Mr. Edward Feeney's plan to obtain State aid for our parochial schools? I have read his letter with great interest. It is perfectly just, reasonable and logical. It is, I am well aware, the opinion held by many Catholics. Yet it seems to me that both he and they have overlooked several points, one of which is the non-Catholic attitude of mind toward things Catholic. Mr. Feeney seems to assume that the majority of our non-Catholic citizens are ready to acknowledge the failure of our public school system. In one portion of his letter he would almost appear to indicate that the public is ready to recognize that the failure of the schools is due to a lack of religious training. That the public is dissatisfied is quite true, but only in so far as the schools have failed in a material way. If the education of Johnny Jones is sufficient to enable him to retain a position offered him by Mr. Business Man, then all is as it should be. If Johnny can't retain it, then something is wrong with the schools. Do you really think that Johnny's socialistic father, and Johnny's mental-science mother are any more willing to acknowledge that Johnny's failure is due to a lack of religious training than is Johnny's atheistic employer or religiously indifferent teacher? Certainly not. It may be that Johnny has adenoids or is a trifle sub-normal; but that there can be any possible connection between badly done work and general irresponsibility on the one hand, and a lack of the knowledge of God on the other is too much for them to admit. I grant that some sincere Protestants do realize that a godless school is a danger, but they are, comparatively speaking, very few.

Let us grant that the public, say, of New York would be quite willing to cut down their $50 per capita to $25 in order to turn over the other $25 to the private schools of the State. Could we, who in spite of our wonderful 16,000,000 are in a decided minority, dictate terms to the majority? Could we tell them exactly upon what terms we could receive the State's money, and (a more important point) could we be quite sure that no laws inimical to the future safety and freedom of our schools would be made? One objection to State aid for Catholic schools is the effect such aid would have upon our Catholic people.

We are giving the public school child free pencils, free pens, free ink, free paper, free books, free lunches, free nurses, free doctors and dentists; public playfields, play teachers for those public playfields, vocational training and vocational guidance. Everything is done to save the child worry, care and expense. What is the result? The more we have given, the more the children and their parents demand, the less grateful they are, the less the child gives in return and the less power of giving he possesses. He is rapidly becoming less robust mentally, and less able to accomplish things. He is unwilling to make any sacrifice whatsoever, no matter how good the end may be.

Now, here is a danger, and a grave one, to our children and their parents. When any one begins, unnecessarily, to depend upon another, whether that other is an individual or the State, for his necessities and his luxuries, his manly self-reliance is gone, and we have left a vertebrateless creature, a parasite. Then comes a willingness to temporize when a matter of principle is at stake. It is only by our poverty and self-denial, and our independent parochial school system that we may ever hope to raise up a generation of honorable, self-reliant, God-fearing, American Catholics. Our Government, as it is, is too paternalistic. Socialism has seen to that. Socialism will also see to it that we receive State aid for our schools. I have heard it advocated by socialists very recently. They can see our danger though we can not. Socialists will also see to the ultimate secularization of our schools. Just give them time and opportunity. All we need to do is to continue the forceful (?) policy we have so consistently pursued.

In conclusion may I ask if we have any reason to expect a greater measure of justice in the future than we have received in the past or than we are now receiving? Does Mr. Feeney really dream that a yearly examination by the Regents of the State University would satisfy all the atheistic, socialistic and anti-Catholic forces at work in our country? What is the price we must pay? An excellent secular education, says Mr. Feeney. We are already giving that free. What is the price? Before we put ourselves and our children in the hands of our enemies, it might be well to find out how many of our 16,000,000 can be depended upon to support Catholic rights at the polls. We need a strong, wise body of intelligent laymen just now, not to get us new rights, but simply to safeguard the ones we are supposed to possess.

Catholic Children are Catholics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As children are not counted in the statistics of the Methodist, Presbyterian and other churches, why object to Dr. Carroll's deduction for children in case of the Roman Catholic Church? The amount he deducts may be open to question, and the taking of the census of 1913 is objectionable, but some deduction gives a better comparison with other religious bodies.

Sandusky, Ohio. A. M. P.

[The first duty of a statistician is to report objective facts, not to arrange them for "comparison." Catholic children are Catholics. Statistics which omit them are, therefore, false. What the Methodists and Presbyterians may do, has not the slightest bearing on the case.—Editor of AMERICA.]

An English Easter in the Seventeenth Century

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The following passage occurs in "Oddsfish" (p. 176) the last novel of the late Mgr. Robert Hugh Benson: "It was in May that Mr. Hamerton had come to us, for Easter that year fell in that month." I thought that the earliest possible date for Easter is March 22, and the latest April 25. Can you tell me how this rule is to be reconciled to Mgr. Benson's May Easter?

Brooklyn, N. Y. A. O'R.

[Mgr. Benson was in error. In the year in question (1680, see page 227), Easter fell on April 21, according to the calendar of Catholic countries, where the Gregorian reform, or New Style, had been adopted. England at that time still followed the Old Style, and according to its calendar April 11 was called Easter, although the actual day observed was the same as in Catholic countries. The error probably arose from supposing that the Old Style date was ten greater than that in the New Style, whereas it was ten less. The first day of the New Style was the day following October 4, 1582. This day was called October 15 in the New Style, while those who still adhered to Old Style called it October 5.

The inverse of the above statement is, however, sometimes true. Russia is the only large country now using the Old Style. In 1910 our Easter fell on March 27, but the Russian Easter fell in that year on their April 18, which was our May 1. In 1907 our Easter was on March 31, but the Russians observed it on their April 22, our May 5. In these cases it will be seen that there was not merely a different date but that the two styles observed Easter on really different days. This happens rather frequently.

The following point may be of interest. Although March 22 is in general the earliest possible date of Easter, yet as our ecclesiastical tables are arranged it can not come earlier than March 23 in the present and the two following centuries. The Easter of 1913 was as early as it is possible for it to be until the year 2200. In 1915 the Russian Easter falls on their March 22.

The Extent of Bigotry

To the Editor of AMERICA:

On noting Mr. Ronald's objection to my article entitled, "Ludicrous Anachronism," I was struck with the largeness of his proposition: "The spirit of intolerant bigotry is as rife in our land to-day as ever in the history of the past." Naturally I sought for the proof; and in the number of instances cited must confess that I did not find it. It will not do to lay at the door of bigotry what formally springs from a source other than specific hatred for Catholics; nor can we saddle upon the whole nation what is not the attitude of at least a determining part. In a word to be bigotry, a thing must injure Catholics, as Catholics; to be "as rife as ever in our history," its extension must be such as to justify our attributing it to Americans in general. There is, however, in my opinion, not an instance given by Mr. Ronald which does not fail to evidence one or both of these elements. Some of them are truly against Catholics, as Catholics, but fail in the necessary universality. Others vindicate their proper extension, but have not been shown to be against Catholics in as much as they are Catholics.

Suggestive films, for instance, are an injury to Catholics but good Protestants and all other upright people are likewise hurt. Filthy papers may be welcomed because of their filth, or because they assail Catholicism; if the reason is their anti-Catholic filth (a thing hard to determine) my objector has yet to show that representative American opinion approves of so vile an attack on one body of citizens. If bigotry opens the mails to the Menace, protests by several Protestant ministers and the several indictments already obtained against its publishers do not facilitate Mr. Ronald's task of showing that Americans in general either believe its columns or sympathize with its designs. As for "priests of God and consecrated women . . . being openly insulted in the streets," I wonder how universal is this and whether even in its rare occurrence public opinion sanctions it. "Why thousands of Americans crowd each other from the box office of theaters where the sacred character of Sisters is made a wretched plaything," Mr. Ronald himself has answered. Or at any rate he has not made clear that it is hatred of Catholics and not looseness of morals that accounts for the crowding he decries. Most of us I think, in view of the fact that Catholics have risen to lofty posts of trust in the country, will agree that public opinion repudiates discrimination against Catholics, because and in as much as, they are Catholics. If it sympathized with the impersonation or insulting of nuns, or the boisterous villainy of the Menace or believed the Guardians of Liberty, I can not see how it could tolerate a Catholic Governor, a Catholic Secretary to the President or a Catholic Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

Of course we must not argue from this that Americans are loyal supporters of the Church; nor does it follow that they are bigots, because they do not rise and demand the suppression of the Menace or the disbanding of the Guardians of Liberty. A thing to be not-white need not be black. An American is not shown to be a bigot, merely by the fact that he is not an active friend of the Church. From non-Catholic Americans we ask but fair play. We can in justice give them no less. Now rapid generalizations that would saddle upon Americans in general the narrow viewpoint of a few relics of the Know-Nothings is hardly fair play. I admit that bigotry is rising here and there in the country, but I deny that Americans in general are in sympathy with the movement. Between the two extremes of opinion, "bigot" and "friend of the Church," is the mean, "non-bigot." If this seem too optimistic, it may be well to remember that optimism is likely to be a relative term. Schopenhauer, for instance, thought we were all too optimistic, while I am tempted to return the compliment to Mr. Ronald. For if the Catholic Church in the United States had no subtler undercurrent to contend with than suggestive films or the open vileness of the Menace we should have far less reason to fear than we now have. And hence Mr. Ronald, I should say, is "too optimistic" at least in this: that minimizing the greater danger he calls into prominence the lesser. This perhaps accounts for the peculiar relation his instances bore to his own proposition and mine; the relation respectively, to the one, of an obvious non sequitur and to the other of great irrelevance. Bad Taste in Society Women

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The action of "Society Catholics" in making up theater parties in Lent and taking their young people to resorts that openly cater to indecency reflects little credit on their refinement, good taste or piety, and stirs the gorge of their coreligionists to voice an indignant protest. The vogue of society people for novelty in amusement blinds them to many things. Little by little there has come about a very visible decadence in social standards of good taste, modesty and good manners which the "old families" were once so united in upholding. The efforts of the Catholic Theater Movement in repressing certain desreputable amusements were met with the argument that "the people called for such amusement." It would seem that a Catholic woman should blush with shame to be quoted as a patroness of such resorts. Moreover, men and women may drift away from the Catholic spirit and cast into open disregard the parental restraints of Mother Church, but the obligations and duties she imposes are founded upon divine precept and may not be ignored without drawing down sooner or later upon themselves and their children the anger of a just God.

Fair Play for Austria and Prussia

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I would like to confront with a few facts from history an article, "The Condition of Peace," printed in the issue of AMERICA for February 20.

From the years 1848-1866 Austria fought in Italy for what were her own rightful possessions. She also fought for the Papal States. She was defeated in 1859. The Papal States were then annexed by the new kingdom of Italy. Austria did not recognize Italy, she did not make peace; but there was merely an armistice, lasting till 1866. Before the war broke out anew in 1866, Austria ceded her Italian possessions, known as Venice, to Napoleon III, with the understanding that he should turn them over to Italy. The Papal States, however, were to be restored to the Pope in case Austria should be victorious in the war. What more a single power could do for the Pope is hard to see. Austria was beaten once more, not indeed in Italy, but in Germany, her fight for the Papal States being one of the causes of her defeat on German soil. In the year 1870 Austria was absolutely unable to do anything against any foreign power.

If it had not been for Austria, whom the writer of the article calls "that master-meddler in the discipline of the Church," there would not have been left one Catholic in Germany after the so-called Reformation. To Austria the Church owes the preservation or rescue from Protestantism of one-half of the German people.

Austria fought, almost single handed, for three hundred years against the Turks and saved thereby the whole of Christianity from the dominion of this enemy of the Church. One ruler of Austria, Joseph II (1780-1790) was a master-meddler in the discipline of the Church, but he ruled only ten years over Austria.

"Prussia typifies heresy," says the writer. This Prussia pays to every priest, to every bishop, to every cardinal a salary, which makes collections unnecessary, collections which, to my own personal experience, keep many away from the Church here in the States. This heretical Prussia looks to it, that every Catholic child, from six to fourteen years of age, receives two hours of religious instruction every week; these two hours of religious instruction are compulsory in all schools except the university. The priest in charge of this instruction has the same rights as any other teacher. Where there is a sufficient number for a Catholic school, a Catholic school is established, the pastor acting as inspector. Every Catholic child has to attend Mass on Sundays and at least once during the week, absentees being subject to the same punishment as absentees from class-hours. This heretical Prussia does not call the priest, nor the subdeacon, to the colors, while the Protestant minister has to serve in the army. What the "heretical" Emperor has done for the French priests during this war, every one ought to know. These few facts I should like to see in print, that both the writer and the readers of the aforesaid article may have an illustration of how Prussia typifies heresy, and how Austria is the master-meddler in the discipline of the Church. I am neither a Prussian nor an Austrian by birth, but I stand for fairness.

Newman's Famous Libel Suit

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the Outlook for March 10, I find the following passage:

> Cardinal Newman was brought up in England for trial for defaming Father Achilli, who had left the Roman Catholic Church for the Protestant communion as Cardinal Newman had left the Protestant Church for the Roman Catholic communion. He was convicted of a libel and was mulcted to the extent of 12,000 English pounds, or $60,000.

Apart from the obvious fact that the reasons which wrought the change in Newman, were quite different from the motives which turned this "profligate in a cowl" to the Protestant Church, and I am not aware that any Protestant Church is now anxious to claim him, may I point out that Father, not Cardinal, Newman was not "mulcted to the extent of 12,000 English pounds" or anything like it. Ward, in his "Life of Cardinal Newman," states that "the costs and expenses of the trial," quite another matter, reached that sum. And the real results of this miscarriage of justice are thus put by the same authority:

In a leading article, The Times spoke of the three days' proceedings as "indecorous in their nature, unsatisfactory in their result, and as little calculated to increase the respect of the people for the administration of justice or the estimation by foreign nations of the English name and character." "We consider," the article added, "that a great blow has been given to the administration of justice in this country, and that Roman Catholics will henceforth have only too good reason for asserting that there is no justice for them in cases tending to arouse the Protestant feelings of judges and juries." These remarks represent the opinion of the educated public. Dr. Achilli was no longer in the public eye an innocent martyr whose testimony against Romanism was unimpeachable. Evidence which could not for the moment prevail with the jury against the wonderful anti-Catholic bigotry of the time, gradually sank into the public mind and had its effect. . . . Achilli's teeth were drawn; he ceased to be an effective champion of the Protestant religion; and he shortly disappeared from the public view. (Italics inserted.)

This passage indicates clearly, the biased mentality of the Outlook writer, who does not hesitate to put on a par, the great Cardinal, and a profligate friar who spoke "not only against the Catholic faith, but the moral law."

Temperance Against Prohibition

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The exceptionally clear, comprehensive, and dispassionate presentation of the subject of "Temperance against Prohibition," which appears in your issue of March 6, deserves the widest possible publicity. It is an appeal not merely to "sensible men of good will," to whom it is directly addressed, but also to those who may, perhaps, neither claim nor deserve that meritorious designation. All men of intelligence should recognize to what serious extent their rights and personal liberty are jeopardized by prohibition—that most pernicious type of folly, which is well characterized by the author of the article as "midsummer madness," and is now rampant under the gross misnomer of "reform." However far the condition of society in the "dark ages" may have been inferior to the exalted civilization which so-called "reformers" claim for the present day, the "dark ages" can not, at least, be denied the merit of having been exempt from the perversions of intellect and the errors of intention which are to-day manifested in "Higher Criticism," "Christian Science," "Socialism," and last, but by no means least, "Prohibition."

That a very large percentage of those who are seeking to inflict prohibition upon this nation are thoroughly honest, conscientious, and actuated by the worthiest motives, is undeniable; but they have either been ignorant of the actual conditions which bear upon the question of how best to promote the cause of true temperance, or have been deceived by the misrepresentations of a small minority, consisting of paid agitators. These agitators make it a matter of business to gain their subsistence by efforts to convert the well-meant intentions of the advocates of temperance into a fanaticism which ignores the rights, not only of "the liquor interests," but also of all other citizens, and which, as has been shown in numerous instances, increases, instead of diminishing, the evils which it claims, in season and out of season, that it is intended to prevent. The acme of trespass upon personal liberty and constitutional rights has been reached in the recent enactment of prohibition legislation in Arizona, under which the practice of the Catholic religion in that State has actually been made contrary to law. And unless the "moderate element in American public life," mentioned by the author of the article to which I have referred, as well as the voters who can move that element to proper action, stem the tide of folly and fanaticism, similar legislation will elsewhere be enacted, and the author's belief that "a quarter of a century hence will see the United States a nation of drug-fiends," will find its realization in the degradation of our country.

No law has ever been made, and no law ever can be made and enforced which will prevent the indulgence of a natural appetite, which, within proper bounds, is neither improper nor harmful; and one of the many detrimental results of legislation to that end, has been to inculcate in the minds of many whose rights have been trespassed upon, a demoralizing contempt for law in general. The regulation of the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the serious injury resultant upon the abuse of liquors, is, however, entirely practicable, and legislation to that effect would be enforceable without involving confiscation of property, violation of vested rights, or undue limitation of the personal liberty of the citizen. Moreover, "the liquor interests" would not only not oppose such legislation, but would find it to their advantage to give their active support to its enforcement. Unfortunately, however, regulation would not redound to the advertising schemes of the self-constituted "reformers." But it should not for that reason fail to receive the hearty support of every one who advocates the only approach to "prohibition" that would be either right or effective, i. e., the regulation of the sale and use of liquors by such fair and reasonable legislation as will command the approval and support of all who are advocates of "temperance." I earnestly urge your readers to heed and take action on "Temperance against Prohibition," and if, in so doing, I make myself an advocate of "the liquor interests," let professional prohibitionists "make the most of it." Regulation can prevent a man from injuring himself and society by excess; but even if it should fail to do so, a stupefied and helpless drunkard is a less dangerous element than a drug-crazed and murderous maniac.

New York. J. SNOWDEN BELL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Intemperance can not be checked and prohibition averted by the means and methods of the article "Temperance against Prohibition" in AMERICA of March 6. Drink is not the gnat some would imply; it takes more than a gnat to arouse the self-sacrificing enthusiasm that possesses the advocates of prohibition, and urges them to unreasonable extremes. Men do not lose their reason for a gnat. If this "gnat" were strained out, the "camels of iniquity" would shrink to very diminutive dimensions. Superintendents of penal and charitable institutions state that drink, directly or indirectly, brings nine-tenths of the inmates to these institutions; and bishops attribute to the same source nine-tenths of the trouble they have in the administration of their office. My experience of thirty-nine years in the priesthood, of more than thirty years as an active member of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, and of twelve years in the Priests' Total Abstinence League, and as an officer in both Associations for the same length of time, corroborates the testimony of these civil and ecclesiastical magistrates.

The urgent need of legislation to prevent the abuses connected with the manufacture and sale of intoxicants in the United States is far from manifest, unless we are prepared to accept the contention of those who advocate prohibition; nor is it clear that practical Catholics generally would approve of the strictest enforcement of such legislation. Appealing to legislation for the cure of every evil is the great mistake of the day. There is entirely too much legislation. What is needed is the enforcement or the repeal of the laws we have. Enforcement of the law does not depend wholly on the police, it must have as its foundation respect for law and authority. Too much has been written by those who profess to fear that Catholic temperance workers may go too far, that readily lends itself to quotation against genuine temperance work and in favor of drinking. The Church has ever insisted on respect for law and authority; and if her admonitions in regard to temperance had been as generally observed as they are neglected, it would have reacted favorably on the public, intemperance would have been kept under fairly good control, and the movement for prohibition might not have been inaugurated or at least not have acquired its present momentum. The movement, however, is not going to be overcome by ridicule and pleasantry, but it may be directed by sympathetic reasoning, for these people are desperately in earnest, even if their zeal is unreasonable. But the continuation of the Mass does not depend on this movement being overcome or controlled; though if it is not controlled, Catholics may be inconvenienced in some places. But who will be to blame? If Catholics had followed the admonitions of the Church, such danger would not have arisen.

Pastors were told by the Council of Baltimore to keep their people away from the saloon, and to get such of them as were in the dangerous liquor business out of it, and to make every effort to root out the vice of intemperance which gives scandal to non-Catholics and is both an obstacle to the spread of the true religion and a perpetual incentive to sin. They were never to cease crying out against the vice and whatever leads to it; for to them the Council looked for the spread of sobriety. The late Pontiff hoped that not only bishops, priests and men of religious orders but also laymen would become members of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America, since those who abstain entirely from all intoxicating drink are worthy of all praise. Priests especially should be conspicuous as models of abstinence. As regards the laity, the Council declares the zeal of total abstainers to be according to knowledge, and commends their societies to the fatherly care of pastors. Those who can not get out of the dangerous business must not sell on Sundays, nor to minors, nor to those who they foresee will abuse drink; and they must not allow sinful language in their places of business. Much more might be cited from Councils and Pontiffs, both as regards priests and people. If these admonitions had been conscientiously followed, conditions would be such as to preclude the danger the writer of the article apprehends from prohibition. To follow these admonitions and induce their readers to follow them should be the work of Catholic writers and leaders, instead of ridiculing and denouncing the extravagances of those who have not an infallible teacher and guide. Let there be a little more Christian charity and respect for the wish of the Church in this matter.

Scottsdale, Pa. M. A. LAMBING.

Witches Not Burned

To the Editor of AMERICA:

May I call attention to a slight error in the article entitled "A Ludicrous Anachronism" in the issue of February 20? I refer to the sentence in the first paragraph in which Cotton Mather's probable words in the event of his appearance at the present time on Broadway, are related. "'Papist' he might say, or 'witches' and of these words, the former for him would be nimbused with all that a bitter Puritan age had laid at the door of Catholics, and the latter would be redolent of the times and environment that made possible Salem and its stake." The inaccuracy to which I refer is the inference to be drawn from the word "stake." This is, evidently, that witches were burned in Salem. Such was not the case. They were tortured in a variety of ways; one was pressed to death with stones and the rest were hung. Hence the name which still clings to the place of execution, "Gallows Hill." I call attention to this error because it appears with such frequency that it might be catalogued with the supposed Jesuit doctrine "the end justifies the means"—or placed in Dr. Walsh's list of historical "Dont's."

The Minimum and a Menace

SINCE the Day of Pentecost dawned on the earth Catholics have been under the constant necessity of going without a great many things. First of all, they had to do without places of worship, then they were driven underground, and counted it but a small thing to have to forego life itself. They had to go without civil rights, without education for themselves or for their children, without food, without possessions, without honor and respect; but even in the blackest days, under the most severe and tyrannical of the penal laws and proscription acts, they never had to go without the Mass. The Mass is the minimum, yet, if the present trend of the latest prohibition laws be taken as indicative, we may not improbably find ourselves in free America called upon to go without the Mass.

Of the nineteen States which are now "dry," Utah, the last to establish State Prohibition, may well typify the menace to our religious rights that faces us. The Wooten State-Wide Prohibition Bill, which passed the House by a vote of 40 to 5 on March 2, prohibits specifically the manufacture of wine for sacramental purposes, the Bill becoming effective on July 1, 1916. Mark the effect. With the importation of wine forbidden, its manufacture penalized, is the Catholic priest to be forced into the disgusting rôle of a smuggler of contraband, or to resort to the low device of illicit distilling, or is the holy Mass to be abandoned altogether in the State of Utah? The conditions admit of no other alternatives so far as the outlook implies at present. Attempts to refer the matter of this Bill to a vote of the people were defeated by 45 to 9; how, then, are the 13,000 Catholics of Utah to help themselves; are they to be forced out of the State, and with such a beginning what assurances have Catholics of the other eighteen "dry" States that they too may not have the same experience under a system of State Prohibition?

Meanwhile, the Supreme Court has taken the homely beer under its protection, and in the Kirmeyer case, where this beverage was delivered in Kansas against the Prohibition law of that State, Justice McReynolds declared the decision of the Supreme Court to be as follows:

> Beer is a recognized article of commerce. The right to send it from one State to another, and the act of doing so, are interstate commerce, the regulation whereof has been committed to Congress, and a State law which denies such right or substantially interferes with or hampers the same is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Is the gratification of what is after all a mere appetite to be afforded more consideration than the most sacred and solemn act of worship that the Catholic Church knows? If the Catholic pastors of Utah and Arizona, observing that the children of this world in their generation are wiser than the children of light, copy their wisdom and their strategies so that the offering of the Holy Sacrifice may not cease altogether, may we expect the Supreme Court to decide that "Altar wine is a recognized article of commerce"? One thing is certain. The matter has now passed beyond the bounds of ethics and economics; it has become a menace to the most vital of all rights, religious rights. What the ferocity of Nero, the cruelty of Julian, of a Henry or Elizabeth Tudor failed to effect, the freak legislation of prohibition extremists is on the high way to accomplish. In the days of the direst persecution there was a minimum; that minimum was the Mass, and now, under a system of freedom and toleration, the Mass is threatened.

Out of the Mouths of Babes

THE children who had the happy thought of writing the following letter are only one out of many hundreds, perhaps thousands, of groups that are crying to Him whose mercy is above all His works, for peace, peace that the world knows not of:

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some time ago our pastor received a communication which was immediately sent to our directress, suggesting a crusade of prayer among the children of the school for peace in Mexico as well as in the European countries. We, the children of SS. Cyril and Methodius School, those of us who have made our first Holy Communion, under the auspices of pastor and directress, have formed a band and each Thursday and Friday, since January 28, we have received Holy Communion in a body for the intention requested. We mean to continue this practice until June, 1915. We number about one hundred and fifty, ranging from nine to fourteen years of age. The younger children of our school recite special prayers at their visits to the Blessed Sacrament and hear Mass every morning. We wish the other parochial and private schools of America would join us.

THE CHILDREN OF SS. CYRIL AND METHODIUS SLOVAK SCHOOL.

This is not the first case in which the Saviour has perfected praise out of mouths of little ones. Long ago, on a certain Sunday, as He wept over the people of Israel, because they knew not the things that were for their peace, He found His consolation in the love and devotion of children. We may well believe that for their sake He would even have spared their parents, had not their hard hearts been set on murdering their Friend of friends. Will He save the world to-day from the full measure of its retribution because of the entreaty of our Catholic children? No one that knows His heart can doubt it.

"Here's a Sitiwation"

THE National Educational Association offers a prize of one thousand dollars for the best essay on "The Essential Place of Religion in Education, with an Outline of a Plan for Introducing Religious Teaching into the Public Schools."

The title, though lengthy, is encouraging. By those who framed it, it was meant to affirm that religion, true religion, has a place in education. But a subjoined explanation dashes hope. This religion "is to be defined in a way not to run counter to the creeds of Protestant, Roman Catholic, or Jew." It is, therefore, a denatured, devitalized, spurious religion. The divinity of Christ, for instance, runs counter to the creed of the Jew, and must, therefore, be omitted. But the omission runs counter to the creed of the Catholic, and of many a Protestant. Whether you omit this truth or include it, you run "counter" to some one's creed. "Here," as the Grinder remarked, "here's a sitiwation for a cove."

As is fairly obvious, this competition is open only to the gentlemen who once proved, in a learned essay, the Objective Identity of Opposites, and to his lineal descendants. To widen the field of competitors, it is respectfully suggested that the title be amended to read: "The Essential Place of Heresy in Education, with an Outline of a Plan for Introducing Heretical Teaching into the Public Schools."

A "Comforting Assurance"

UNDERTAKERS are now printing announcements like the following:

> A new and better way of burial. The more modern undertakers recommend an outer receptacle of moisture-proof cement composition reinforced with steel. The —— vault is a comforting assurance against the wet, unsanitary old-fashioned grave.

What a solace it must be to the dying rich man of to-day to know that after his soul has gone to judgment his body will not be consigned to the "wet, unsanitary, old-fashioned grave," but by being entombed in an "outer receptacle of moisture-proof, cement composition, reinforced with steel," will long be preserved from the ravages of death. Should Dives' life, by the by, chance to be one of extraordinary holiness, a tightly-sealed sepulcher may prove a great convenience to the promoter of his cause. As this newly-invented "outer receptacle" will now become, in all probability, the "correct thing" for funerals, the "high cost of dying" will be lamented more tearfully than ever.

Leaving this life for another world would be an unostentatious and inexpensive proceeding if men of means felt greater concern about where their souls are to be forever than the interest they show regarding the place their bodies are to lie for a comparatively short period. To a Catholic, provision that is made for a hundred requiem Masses ought to be a far more "comforting assurance" than is the prospect of avoiding a "wet, unsanitary, old-fashioned grave." But as the poor are now as eager for a splendid funeral as the rich, these expensive "outer receptacles" will doubtless have a large sale, and the undertaker will prosper. Meanwhile, however, the souls of those whose mortal remains have been interred so securely, may long be kept, owing to the pagan vanity of their relatives, from entering the place of refreshment, light and peace.

The War's Cost

MR. SAMUEL, the President of the British Local Government Board, who is reputed to be a master of figures, remarked not long ago that any one who makes a present of one thousand pounds to the Allies' war-fund can have the comfort of knowing that his gift will meet the vast armament's expenses for just one minute and a half. Mr. Samuel's hearers were left to compute for themselves the value to England of a patriotic offering, say, of only five pounds. Great Britain alone is said to be spending more than £1,000,000 a day on the war. Germany, it is calculated, used 120,000 shells daily for a time, at an average outlay of $10.00 a shell, though some of the big shells cost $500 each. A Connecticut firm is said to be providing England with $25,000,000 worth of cartridges, and another American agent received orders for war supplies which came in all to some $150,000,000. After allowing for exaggerations these figures will give some idea of the present war's cost reckoned merely in dollars and cents.

What the great conflict is costing in things far more serious than money may be gathered from the report that scores of eminent artists, scientists and authors have already fallen in the French and German armies. Add to that the misery and wretchedness of the invaded countries, the starving people, desolate homes, and ruined churches; reckon up the dreadful toll of killed, wounded and missing, which some compute at 6,000,000 up to February 1; then recall the crippling or total stopping of missionary activities at home and abroad the war has caused, and some faint conception may be had of the disasters the present conflict has already brought in its train.

Can not the prayers of Catholics put an end to these horrors? On Peace Sunday, March 21, if all the children of the Church will come before God's throne with clean hearts and glowing faith, and plead there earnestly for a cessation of hostilities, imploring Him in the words of the Pope's prayer to "Pity the countless mothers in anguish for the fate of their sons; pity the numberless families now bereaved of their fathers; pity Europe over which broods such havoc and disaster," He will mercifully hearken, let us hope, to our prayers and give the world peace.

Women and Children First

AS if in answer to a recent query in AMERICA, a correspondent writes the New York Times, in behalf of the "Blue Cross." This society is in great need of cotton, alum, linseed, surgical bandages, and rugs, not for wounded soldiers, but for wounded horses. At the same time, the Red Cross and other societies appeal for funds to help them feed starving women and children.

"Women and children first," was once the first article in the creed of chivalry. Now, it would seem, it must be revised to include the horse. This is zoophily run mad. Let there be not talk of horses, when what once were men lie writhing unattended on the field, and gaunt mothers and wan, wasted children hold out pleading hands for bread.

Billion Leaflet Campaign

"TO make possible socialism in our time," a billion leaflet plan has been devised by the Appeal. This, it argues, would mean ten leaflets for every man, woman and child in the country. They are to be struck off by "the same press that prints the Appeal, at the rate of 25,000 an hour." Ten thousand two-page leaflets can thus be sold at the price of $2.50, express or freight extra. To attract the casual reader the first of the leaflets will be headed, "Socialism Exposed." With this bait those who would otherwise keep aloof from socialistic literature are to be caught. The billion copies must be distributed between April 1, 1915, and election day, 1916. Such is the plan. It may not succeed entirely. Socialist plans, like others, "gang aft agley." Yet it will, at least, succeed in part. The very output of leaflets is itself a success. The following are some suggestions from a comrade in Erie, Pa., for their distribution:

Divide your ward into districts of about 100 houses each. Assign one comrade to each district.

Start out early Sunday morning. Six o'clock in summer is a good hour. Get around just after the newsboys and milk man.

WHERE TO PLACE LITERATURE

1. Under the lid of the mail box, or in the wire holder, leaving the heading of the leaflet in plain view.

2. Inside a Sunday newspaper. Open the newspaper lying on the porch and slip leaflet inside.

3. Or slip the leaflet under the door.

DON'T DO IT

Don't throw the leaflet loose on the porch.

Don't fold the leaflet too small. It should show up prominently.

Don't wait around for some one to go with you. Do the work yourself.

Don't be afraid of making a noise walking over the porch. Nobody will hurt you.

Don't put leaflets out of sight inside a mail box. Leave them prominently displayed.

We quote this as an instance of the methods pursued by socialism to carry on its propaganda, and of the willing activity of the host of comrades upon which it counts. The same methods are used and the same readiness is displayed in every country. The complete ruin of the International, the practical repudiation of fundamental principles, the failure of theory after theory, the Babel of confusion within the party, all these, and a hundred other deterrent reasons, will not serve to cool the enthusiasm. The sowing of the tares, the spreading of revolution, will continue unhindered. The Christianity of the Church will be combated as before, insidiously or openly, in the name of a man-made, revolutionary Christianity defying the Church and the Commandments.

The question naturally suggested by this spectacle is of intense importance. It should be applied individually and personally to ourselves: "What are we doing to make possible the one thing which alone is of supreme consequence, the coming of God's true kingdom in our time?" The vast possibilities of the propaganda of literature for this purpose must be more perfectly and practically understood by us. Truth, no less than error, has need of it.

Euphemia and the Euphemists

EUPHEMIA is a country whose discovery dates back before the dawn of history. The Greeks named the land and sent large colonies to it. The geographical boundaries have never been clearly settled. South of Euphemia lies a very thickly populated nation called Mendacia. The Euphemists are such great friends and allies of the Mendacians that they have not gone to the trouble of surveying their respective territories, or of establishing definite boundaries. To the north, however, is the land of Sinceria, not at all friendly to its southern neighbors and sharply divided from Euphemia in landscape and climate. Euphemia is a land of shady valleys and heavy mists, whereas Sinceria is a bracing, mountainous country, swept bright by stiff winds.

The first point a traveler would notice in Euphemia would be the silence of all the children. They may occasionally be seen, but never heard. The enfant terrible is either gagged to silence or packed off to school amid the hills of Sinceria, until the period of self-consciousness dawns. This custom was first introduced when the King of Euphemia was paying a visit to one of his subjects. A particularly well-behaved child said to him, making a pretty curtesy: "Your majesty is a wonderful man." "Why do you say that?" asked the charmed King. "Because mama told me to," replied the child, who was rushed off that very night to a boarding-school in Sinceria.

The stranger would notice one odd fashion of Euphemia: its partiality for the color white. For furs the Euphemists favor sheep's clothing. Everything in Euphemia is kept white-washed, and as no weather-proof enamel has been as yet invented there, the process of applying new coats of white, when the former application is soiled or scaling off, has to be continually carried on. For this reason most of the inhabitants know something of the art. All the sepulchers even are whitened. It should, however, be noted that the Euphemists themselves never employ the terms, grave or sepulcher. They refer to the ultimate-resting place and the ancestral mausoleum. An exception to the prevailing color-scheme of mother-of-pearl, which is Euphemistic for white, is found in a substance once styled rouge, but now known as rose-talcum. The rose-talcum is worn over the universal smile that is a national trait of the Euphemists. An inhabitant, since ostracized, likened the smile to patent-leather or vaseline.

The language of Euphemia is especially worthy of note. The merchants are skilful in its use; the lawyers and doctors are more expert still in Euphemistic, but if a stranger wishes to hear the language spoken in its purity, he must mingle in the first society of Euphemia. He will note that perfection when his car stops at the porte-cochére. The attendants at the entrance will inform him of the unavoidable absence or most delighted presence of the occupants of the mansion. "Houses" are obsolete in Euphemistic. He will receive missives, or even epistles, couched in the exquisite vocabulary of regrettable previous engagements, or of supreme felicitations. Should he finally succeed in gaining admission into the inner circle, he will notice that sin and vice are vulgar terms. At times, however, the white-wash has an unhappy propensity for flaking off, and the once ornate nomenclature, as in the case of "saloon," must be replaced in turn by "restaurant," "café," "cabaret," and "cafeteria." Euphemia is sensitive to any lack of respectability. Euthanasia and kleptomania are well-known substitutes for sordid terms. People in Euphemia are "frank," "daring," or, perhaps, "indiscreet." They incline to new thought esotericism and cosmic affinities, and by this and similar parlance, especially by incompatibility of temperament, they gracefully drape over a multitude of sins—hush!—the term they used is not sins but foibles, or better, atavistic tendencies.

It was one of the famous heroes of Euphemia who reduced the practice of cleaning the outside to a fine art when he rid himself of cowardice, injustice and brutal murder, by the simple process of washing his hands. It was the same Euphemist who asked, "What is truth?" Euphemia has never heard the answer.

LITERATURE

A Magic Carpet

WHAT a thrill of excitement must have passed over the fortunate person of Bagdad whose good luck it was to make the acquaintance of the magic carpet. He simply sat down on the carpet, wished to be in a certain place, and ere the wish was formulated he was there. From all that we learn about the story the only limit to such traveling was that it was confined to contemporary events. But there is no need to lament the passing of the days of magic carpets, we have our own magic, and a magician from Boston, who carries us to scenes quite as wonderful as those the Bagdad traveler saw, and in some instances quite as problematical; nor need we stir one inch away from our own fireside. In fourteen locked chambers, "The World's Story" (Houghton, Mifflin Co.) contains the history of mankind from the days of the earliest civilizations, passing with majestic sweep through the ages, on and on, never stopping, until time turns in on us and we come back to America in season for the Gettysburg celebration in 1913 and the Panama Canal.

Here is no solitary journey, taken with the company of a dilapidated cicerone mispronouncing words and names to his heart's content in a rusty, weather-beaten voice, breaking in with inconsequent remarks in season and out. The magician has summoned to his command some five hundred and fifty of his jinn—good, bad and indifferent, after the manner of jinn—and bound them with unbreakable fetters by the magic spell of the printed word. So chained, they can not escape or refuse to obey when the potent charm of opened pages calls them from their retreat.

The company leads off with Confucius, and with him are Kubla Khan, and Jimmu Tenno the first Mikado of Japan; the great leaders of the Old Testament, and the early Aryans, who lived in the far distant ages in India. The early picture writers of Egypt have their story to tell. Homer is there, Demosthenes, Plato and the loquacious Herodotus. There are the Latins: Horace, Catullus, Virgil. There are the ancient monks, Abbots Adamnam and Aelfric hailing from the Celtic monasteries of Scotland and the North, and following in a later age Froissart the Chronicler, Benvenuto Cellini, Sir Walter Raleigh; a host from every civilized people inhabiting the globe from long ago down to our own day.

Among such a company, each with the prevailing prejudice of his time, each with his own message, and, in many an instance, each with his own axe to grind, to be fore-warned is to be fore-armed. The modern historian—taking modern history in its technical meaning—who is not a Catholic is, as a rule, notoriously biased and singularly unfair when he, or she, is moved to touch upon some Catholic theme. Just here is where the Catholic traveler, who thinks of setting out to explore the fourteen chambers that contain "The World's Story," will wisely take stock of his company, lest on the way he fall among thieves. The entertainment which such writers as Hume, Gibbon, James Anthony Froude, and the airy Voltaire—to mention but a few—may afford is more than counterbalanced by the inaccuracy of their statements, and their deliberate perversion of the truth when that truth happens to be Catholic. On a magic journey, just as on any other journey, there are risks; and the mental bruises are not so easily eradicated as the bruises of the body, and are far more harmful. So too, a jinnee being a thing of the shades you can not hit back.

We begin our journey then, with Confucius, whose delight it is to carry us back to the year 2356 B. C., when Yaou, the model emperor, ruled China. In that same land some centuries later we meet the Franciscan missionaries; first of all Brother John of Corvino, who labored alone for eleven years. Then the Jesuits who, in the sixteenth century, won the hearts of the Chinese by their exquisite tact, and led them by the way of knowledge to the Faith. Japan, if the shades are to be believed, apparently never at any time had received missionaries, and India is strangely silent as to the heroic labors of St. Francis Xavier, of whom the Malabar Christians derive their origin; while in darkest Africa there shines but one little light, even the Protestant missionary, Mungo Park.

From Africa to Rome is a hasty flight, and the letter of Pliny the Younger to the Emperor Trajan arrests our attention for a moment. "The Christians," says Pliny, "declared that the sum of their guilt or their error amounted to this, that on a stated day they had been accustomed to meet before daybreak and to recite a hymn among themselves to Christ . . . when this ceremony was concluded, it had been their custom to depart and meet again to take food. . . ." He asks the Emperor's advice and Trajan writes:

> You have adopted the proper course, my dear Pliny, in examining into the cases of those who have been denounced to you as Christians, for no hard-and-fast rule can be laid down to meet a question of such wide extent. The Christians are not to be hunted out; if they are brought before you and the offence is proved, they are to be published.

From Trajan the story of Rome is carried down to the Edict of Constantine, and ends with a burst of glory at the court of the magnificent young Byzantine Emperor Justinian.

The splendor of Rome continues through Italy, passing by Charlemagne, and in the whirl of life are St. Francis, the great popes and the artists, with Galileo in his old rôle; but the fall of Rome and the usurpation of the sovereignty of the Pope are altogether too optimistic not to arouse the suspicions of the wandering Catholic who may have other ideas as to the equity of this page of history. After passing in review the whole tale of French history, the coronation of Charles VII at Reims, the death of Joan the Maid; after having flitted airily across Spain, where, by the way, they show you the long-suffering Torquemada and the Inquisition as a sort of bogey, and a somewhat overdone bogey at that, the magic carpet whirls the traveler through Eastern Europe and Turkey, with a brief stop to view the fall of Constantinople and the triumph of the Crescent over the Cross.

On and on, through Germany, with a sly peep at Luther and the Reformation, a hurried rush through Switzerland, and then the Netherlands. A wise traveler will discount all he may be told regarding the Inquisition, and make a few inquiries concerning the terrible Jesuits and the wily Franciscan who engineered the assassination of William the Silent, Prince of Orange.

Great Britain and Ireland have their tale to unfold. Who would have thought, however, that King Alfred the Great was a Catholic and went to Mass: the historians are always silent about it. St. Thomas of Canterbury suffers in his reputation because opinions as to the idea of a prelate differ. And with Friar Roger Bacon in disgrace as a magician, and Bishop Stephen Gardiner slyly lurking in the shadows as a bloody papist, nothing less than the sunny presence of Good Queen Bess will light up the dismal picture. "The Lady Elizabeth," says Heywood, who possessed a pretty wit, "was born on the eve of the Virgin's Nativity, and died on the eve of the Virgin's Annunciation. Even that she is now in heaven with all those blessed virgins that had oil in their lamps"!

At last, having traversed the globe, and having seen all the glory of the world go by, and having, incidentally, learned the fallibility of historians, the traveler returns home to his native America, with just one little stop in Florida where they show a "bigoted Romanist"—a delicate compliment, that, to Catholic readers!—one Philip II of Spain. Then home to the ring of the telephone, the crash of the steam shovel, and the crackling of the wireless. The fourteen closed chambers have yielded up their secrets, and the five hundred and fifty jinn have done their best—or their worst!

REVIEWS

The New International Encyclopedia. Second Edition. Eight volumes, from A-Arabic to Enteritis-Foraker. New York: Dodd, Mead & Company. $5.00 a volume.

This edition of the "New International Encyclopedia" has been revised in every article, we are informed, and is printed from type entirely reset. The completed work will be considerably enlarged and will consist of twenty-four volumes. Of the three original editors two have died, Daniel Coit Gilman and Harry Thurston Peck. The third, Frank Moore Colby, has undertaken the responsibility for the second edition in conjunction with Dr. Talcott Williams. As the reviewer assumes that the editors of the "New International" would like to have a Catholic's opinion of the work's treatment of religious questions, the following remarks are confined to such topics: It is plain that no conscious discourtesy toward Catholics was anywhere intended by the editors, while the names of several Catholic writers are given who are held responsible for certain matters directly and exclusively Catholic. But the manifold subjects of general religious interest are contributed, as a rule, by men who are apparently far removed from orthodox Christianity. In some articles the writers have at least confined themselves to objective statements of mainly non-Catholic views. In others, however, this is not the case.

As the first illustration, the question of the origin of man may be taken. Thus under "Adam" we learn that "The first three chapters of Genesis is a composite production embodying various tales or myths." Turning to the long article on "Evolution" we are met with the ipse dixit statement: "The proof of man's origin from some other primate is now past dispute. In fact no scientist now doubts man's descent, less directly from all lower forms of life, and more immediately from a common ancestor with the anthropoid ape." Life itself simply sprang into being by spontaneous generation, "the materials for the formation of the first bit of living protoplasm being ready at hand." We next find that religion has evolved in a similar way: from materialism to polytheism and thence to monotheism.

Coming to the many articles bearing upon the Scriptures, it is plain that higher criticism or similar novelties are of prime importance here as representing the popular theories of the day. Of the Book of Daniel, for instance, it is stated that Bertholet has "shown" that "much of the apocalyptic material of the book has a foreign origin in Babylonian and Persian mythology." Of two other of the inspired books of the Old Testament it is asserted that one is a product of Oriental scepticism and that the other espouses the rationalistic tendencies of the later Sadducees. Of "Elijah" we are told that "an old storm myth, in which the rolling of the clouds is taken as portraying the storm god himself riding in his chariot, may have been incorporated into the story of the old prophet." The prophets themselves, under the term "Demoniac," are described as men who, in spite of their "high moral ideals," believed themselves possessed by a spirit, and no exception is made of Our Lord who "attributes His own work to a spirit working through him that must not be blasphemed." He is thus treated with commiserating indulgence for having innocently fallen under the sway of His age's superstitions. Actual obsession is not, of course, admitted, since demons are "a late Jewish and Christian development" of pagan mythology and do not exist, as we are informed in another place.

In such statements there is doubtless no intention of attacking religion, but the reader is simply given to understand that these are the last words of wisdom on the subjects in question. We are passing through an era of materialism which often retains the name of Christianity and our encyclopedias reflect the spirit of the age. The article on "Christianity" would seem to ignore the only Christianity the Church has ever known, but gives space to chronicling every mental aberration of the modern university professor. We are told apodictically that Christ founded no church, but that Christianity, as independent of the Jewish church, was launched by Paul. It took over many Jewish elements; it borrowed from Greek philosophy and was influenced by Greek theology. The sacerdotal tendency transplanted from Judaism and strengthened by Augustine, finally culminated in the papacy. Hence the Catholic Church!

The positiveness of unproved assertions like the foregoing, the array of apparent evidence, the reference to rationalistic authorities and the frequent ignoring of orthodox views as not worthy of scientific consideration will necessarily leave the seeds of doubt or total unbelief in the minds of the average reader, for no one but a Catholic specialist is fitted to refute the errors scattered broadcast in a single article as evident or established "facts."

As an instance of another kind a passing reference should here be made to a treatise of many pages found under the term "Ethics." The dogmatic conclusion of the writer is that there is no common chief end or summum bonum for mankind, but that each man has his own chief end which may sometimes vary from week to week, as in the growing boy. "The summum bonum is a serial system of ends which are, each in its turn, the most desirable ends capable of pursuit." So the author goes on through several columns, telling us that "Responsibility is a means employed to maintain an organized society," and that "Buddhism, Christianity and Mohammedanism, as moral ideals, owe their ascendency in large measure to the magnetism of their founders." Morality, in a word, changes like our diet.

As a final illustration, take the article "Charities." It is here surely that the Catholic Church with her countless religious Orders devoted to the relief of human misery, stands first and foremost. The only consolation given us, however, in the article is the statement that in the early Christian Church "a reckless system of charity developed," which was either wisely suppressed or which, during the Reformation, "lost" most of its property and was unable to continue the support of a large number of "undeserving poor." Private charities, says the "New International," should be confined to those forms of relief still in the experimental stage. Moreover, "The first effort to systematize charitable relief was made in New York in the year 1842, by a committee of philanthropic citizens organized by Robert M. Hartley." Apparently the writer of that article has never gotten beyond the literature of his own little coterie of modern commercialized social agents. There is a world of wisdom, however, that has not yet been absorbed by their philosophy. J. H.

War Brides. By MARION CRAIG WENTWORTH. New York: The Century Company. $0.50.

The Appetite of Tyranny. By G. K. CHESTERTON. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.00.

What is Wrong with Germany? By WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $1.00.

Can Germany Win? By AN AMERICAN. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.00.

How Belgium Saved Europe. By DR. CHARLES SAROLEA. Philadelphia: J. B Lippincott Company. $1.00.

The Audacious War. By CLARENCE W. BARRON. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $1.00.

Here are half a dozen books bearing on the present war. "War Brides" is a short play in one act, every word of which is a protest against war. The principal character of the group of desolate women who are left in their peasant home to work and grieve and wait, becomes crazed by the suspense. Losing that self-control and self-repression with which the weaker but braver portion of mankind has always borne its sorrows, she breaks out into agonized protests. She is woman personified; and with elemental crudeness, but with fearful force, she voices the torture of heart that is the portion of so many hundreds of thousands of wives and mothers and daughters through these, their weary days and endless nights of enforced idleness. The play, which begins sadly and ends horribly, is a startlingly vivid picture of the price that woman has been forced to pay for the caprice and the hatred and the ambition of man. The conviction is irresistible that her lot is harder than his. Her stand against war would be adamantine. Not the man in the field, but the woman in the home knows the meaning of war.

In "The Appetite of Tyranny" Mr. G. K. Chesterton has written a book that few of his admirers will applaud. In spite of its literary value, its clever sarcasm, its intensely personal note, its crystal clearness, and numerous other qualities that one instinctively associates with the author's name, this last volume will add little to his reputation. It is so pitilessly unfair, so undignified in its abuse, so clearly prejudiced that no one but a most bitter partisan will treat it seriously. Whatever truth there may be in Mr. Chesterton's animadversions on certain racial characteristics and aspirations of the Germans, he has spoiled their effect by exaggeration. In fact to the very end one hopes that Father Brown will turn up and set matters straight. Unfortunately the little priest does not appear.

The spirit and treatment of the question in "What is Wrong with Germany?" is quite the contrary of Mr. Chesterton's. Written by a man who for many years has been publishing books on German affairs, it is sane and temperate throughout. It starts with the assumption that Germany is entirely in the wrong in the present struggle, and endeavors to prove that the European catastrophe is the natural outcome of a number of hidden but powerful psychological tendencies that have long been at work among those who have been deliberately shaping Berlin's policy. The author shows a surprisingly wide acquaintance with modern German thought and aspiration, and is content for the most part to let German leaders speak for themselves; he is confident that in this way he convicts them on their own testimony. The book is cold and judicial, and although it is a severe arraignment, it is always dignified and courteous.

"Can Germany Win?" as is clear from its title, is an attempt to forecast the outcome of the war. Basing his opinion on statistics of a very varied and detailed kind, the author declares that the Germans are very strong in resources, much stronger than Englishmen, at least those who have not yet gone to the field, are inclined to believe. What he says on Germany's food supply throws considerable light on the present much-discussed problem of the possibility of Germany being starved by the Allies. His final answer is that Germany can not win, but he predicts that her defeat will cost Great Britain far more than she suspects. The book, although written by an American, is frankly English in its sympathies, but bears the stamp of first hand, accurate and extensive information. Its value, however, is somewhat lessened by the fact that the author's name is withheld.

"How Belgium Saved Europe" is extremely sad reading. All the horrors of the story, with which the public is familiar, are rehearsed graphically by one who passed through them all. Liége, Namur, Brussels, Louvain, Malines and Antwerp are successive stages in the history of what the author calls the "Martyrdom of Belgium." There are chapters on atrocities, on "The Hero King," on the Belgian people, on the sufferings and prospects of the refugees and on the debt that the Allies owe to the Belgian resistance. It is heroic Belgium from beginning to end.

"The Audacious War" treats of the first six months of the war from a business man's point of view, and records and interprets facts in the light of their commercial causes and results. The standpoint taken throughout is finance. A great deal of useful information, not otherwise easily available, is presented in brief and intelligible form. J. H. F.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The March Month, which the war has kept from reaching us till now, opens with an interesting paper on "The Beginnings of the London Oratory," by the Rev. J. R. M'Kee, who quotes some hitherto unpublished letters of Father Faber. "Ecclesiastical Miracles" are discussed by Father Sydney Smith. James Britten examines and praises Neale's "Hymnal Noted." John Ayscough, Father Martindale and Mary Samuel Daniel contribute stories. Naturally there is a great deal in the editorials about the war. Regarding Russia's persecution of Catholics, the editor observes:

> The neutral onlooker sees in the eastern theater of war (German and Austrian papers take care that he does) abominable oppression, on the part of one of the Allies, of the civil population, even more atrocious than that of Belgium, because directed against conscience as well as against person and property. He does not read of any condemnation of this conduct on the part of England or France. . . . She (Russia) has many apologists at present in England—Professor Vinogradoff, Mr. Stephen Graham, Mr. Wells, and others—who are eloquent about her essential spirituality and capacity for the highest form of civilization. If these gentlemen would explain satisfactorily why in Galicia she is practising the lowest form of barbarism, then the cause of the Allies would recover that valuable moral support which her present conduct is forfeiting.

With a hundredth part of the million pounds a day England is spending to maintain her "personal liberty," notes the Month, "slums could be abolished, old age endowed, education improved, industries promoted," etc. and the editor looks forward hopefully to getting "Christianity and its sanctions behind our conventions and treaties."

The Catholic Convert, edited by Stuart P. West, published by the New York Catholic Converts' League, and "devoted to the movement back to Holy Mother Church," is a bright little magazine which began publication with the present month. The Convert will devote itself to articles of special interest to converts, will give to all its readers a better knowledge of the Church's mission to the world. Catholics born and bred within the fold, know little of the trials, mental and physical, to which many an earnest soul seeking the truth, is subjected. "Cut off on his conversion by his well-to-do father, as is the custom," a phrase picked from an account in the Convert, shows the further difficulties which often await him after being received into the Church. The Convert League has done good work in helping cases of this kind, and it is hoped that the Convert, by making such efforts known, will extend the field of the League's usefulness.

Those who like this sort of thing, to paraphrase an ancient critique, will probably be pleased with Conan Doyle's new book, "The Valley of Fear." (Doran, $1.25.) Attended by the faithful Watson, grown in ten years even more stupid, if such a devolution be possible, the great Sherlock stalks through its pages, only to be foiled, it would appear, by the machinations of Moriarty, the prince of crime. The story within the story, an old device with this teller of tales, is a page from the history of a western mining town under the domination of a very active and bloody secret society. The ethics of this part of the adventures of Sherlock are a bit askew, but in fairyland one need not too curiously examine principles to see if they be four-square.

"Alsace and Lorraine from Cæsar to Kaiser" (Putnam's, $1.25), by Ruth Putnam, is an admirable account of the always varying and often thrilling vicissitudes of the long historical life of perhaps the most contested and contesting territory and people in Europe. Celtic, Roman, Frankish, Teutonic, governed by native or foreign princes, the prey or barter of every Continental power that happened to be uppermost, the Alsatians and Lorrainers, whether their speech be German or French or mingled patois, always preserved their individuality and exercised an industrial, educational and religious influence far out of proportion to their numbers. Assailed by heresy on all sides they never abandoned the faith they received from the Irish monks, and to this day are distinguished by the number of their missionaries. Their story, adequately told, necessarily recalls much of the history of Europe, and the author's book is both adequate and interesting. It is one of the few volumes occasioned by the present war that is as impartial as it is opportune.

From the Charles E. Merrill Co., New York, have come three new volumes of their neat "English Texts" series. Mr. Frederick Houk Law has furnished with introduction and notes, a dozen of Poe's tales and eleven of his poems; Mr. Claude M. Fuess has done as much for thirteen "Selected Short Stories" ranging from Scott's "Wandering Willie" to Kipling's "Wee Willie"; and a book of "Selections from American Poetry," edited by Charles Robert Gaston and Julian W. Abernethy, contains Poe's "Raven," Longfellow's "Courtship of Miles Standish," Whittier's "Snowbound," followed by poems from the works of Lowell, Bryant, Emerson, Holmes and Whitman. The critical and biographical sketches are quite adequate for classroom purposes.

Recent Currents in Education

"THE horrible and wretched plaege," writes dear little Marjorie Fleming, "that my multiplication gives me you cant conceive it the most Develish thing is 8 times 8 and 7 times 7 it is what nature itself cant endure." So wrote Scott's "bonnie, wee croodlin doo," more than a century since, confiding her sorrows to pages that have made the world sweeter.

BUILDING A CURRICULUM

Could school boards and harassed superintendents write as well as eight-year-old Marjorie Fleming, they would call the task that besets them, a "horrible and wretched plaege, a most Develish thing, what nature itself cant endure." For their lot is to build a curriculum for our schools, and their well-meant labors are usually rewarded with major maledictions. Like the Deacon's shay, their careful programs go to pieces all at once when tried; but, of course, unlike this famous vehicle, they never attain the age of a hundred years.

The world is so full of a number of things, we are wisely reminded by R. L. S., that we should all be as happy as kings. But the sequence does not seem to follow, at least not in Denmark. This number of things such as plumbing, and painting pictures, and the practice of medicine, and chauffeurring, to coin a handy phrase, makes us wish to fit our children to partake generously of the cultural and financial benefits which they may return. We feel our personal unfitness for the task, and so we throw it on the school, the George of our present era.

WHAT IS A CURRICULUM?

Now, as is well known, a school attains its purposes through its curriculum, and a curriculum, as a small boy, proud of his ability to toss about thus carelessly, your quadrisyllabic word, once told me, is things you study. Perhaps it is. Speaking philosophically, one may allow that this is its material cause. But my youthful informant was ignorant of the doctrine of Final Causes. A great many industrious curriculum-builders are in like case. Many topics of study they inscribe in their curricula, but they do not seem to know what the result of the frequently curious combination will be, or should be; or else, they are trying to effect a number of essentially different things through the agency of one cause. The exacting public demanded that the schools turn out paper-hangers and poets and printers and painters, and almost everything else except preachers and pugilists, full-panoplied upon the world. The school, always ready to oblige, looked about for means. For years it had tottered along on one fairly comprehensive curriculum, now found, in the light of these new demands, utterly lacking. Hence in response to the call of the public, experts devised a series of alternating curricula for the grammar school, admirably adapted to meet the special gifts, and evolve the hidden talents of Johnny and Esmerelda. The methods of the trade-school and the technical school, almost infinitely varied in their scope, have thus invaded the grades. But with even these the public, or a loud-talking section of it, is not wholly satisfied. Our boys and girls, it is asserted, are not trained "to meet the demands of practical life." Our curriculum-makers, yet panting from the toil of unremitting labor, may thus be excused for the mild profanity of terming their task, "a more Develish thing than 8 times 8 and 7 times 7."

THE SCHOOL "SURVEYOR"

Sluggishness is the last vice that can be predicated of our school authorities by any one who wishes to remain within the bounds set by the Eighth Commandment. Of late years they have gone so far, some of them, as to call in the aid of professional "school surveyors." These individuals, whose function is to study the mental, moral and physical wants and needs of families and localities, and to report their findings as the basis of a new curriculum, are in great favor with Dr. Leonard P. Ayres, director of the Russell Sage Foundation, and with all who take their opinions from this master. But the loving attitude with which they were once regarded by practical teachers and school officials, seems fast turning to a spirit of cold disdain. Within the memory of living man, certain surveyors from Columbia and other institutions of learning, "laid out," as the scientific phrase runs, the city of New York. Incidentally, too, they "laid out," in the sense of the slang phrase, a goodly array of the teachers of Manhattan and environments. But these ladies and gentlemen replied in a book which, it must be allowed, was a hit, a very palpable hit, making the learned surveyors look decidedly foolish. More recently, before the National Education Association, Dr. Maxwell of the New York schools, and Mrs. Ella Flagg Young of Chicago, said some most cutting and sarcastic things touching the work of these hapless surveyors. The utterances of Dr. Maxwell were not transmitted by the Associated Press. But the doughty Mrs. Young, smarting under the realization that "many were longing to survey us. I heard it on every side. Everybody wanted to survey us. Even the university right within our limits wanted to survey us," remarked in high dudgeon, that it was time the "school survey was thrown into the discard." Ferocious Mrs. Young!

AN AXE TO GRIND

But it should not be hastily concluded that the school survey is not a most valuable aid in educational work. The results of any project are conditioned by our accurate knowledge of what we want to do and how to do it, together with skill in using the available means. The value of a sane school survey thus becomes apparent. But it is useless, or rather, decidedly harmful, when conducted by a parcel of cranks who are determined to make the facts fit their prejudices. A man with an axe to grind does not readily win confidence, unless he hides the axe and, even then, he is always in danger of being found out.

Perhaps the efforts of the curriculum-makers and the unwearied school surveyors might be blessed with a larger meed of success, did they permit themselves to reflect that the proper end of education is to train the child's intellect as well as his fingers, to make a man out of him, not a mere economic unit whose chief merit is that he readily meets with profitable employment, and can turn all his circumstances into money. Vocational schools and trade schools have their place, and it is an honored place, in any general scheme of education. But they should not be allowed to occupy the whole stage.

MR. TAFT'S PROPOSAL

Just at present we are crushed with wrecked curricula, "sequential groups," "allied units" and "psychological considerations." The New York Sun suggests that "abracadabra" might be added without harm to this "allied group," since in any case, "curriculum is the beginning, middle and end, the process and aim of American education." Mr. Taft thinks that order will never evolve from this chaos until we have established a National university. This is equivalent to adding another to the long list of discredited curriculum-manufacturers and school surveyors, and entrusting to this public body a power which makes it far more dangerous to education than its predecessors. The Bureau of Education has not written a glorious autobiography. It made a notable mess of its efforts to standardize the colleges, not, as the Boston Transcript thinks, because it has no official power, but because, from the first, it sought to impose upon the colleges the views of a self-appointed expert, as the last word in educational wisdom. Mr. Taft would confer upon this Bureau the authority to investigate and standardize the schools, to grant teaching certificates after competitive examination, and, in brief, to determine the whole scope of education in this country. To entrust such power as this to any but an archangel, would be a highly dangerous proceeding.

The establishment of a National university means the rise of despotism in education. It will strongly entrench another enemy of Christianity, for the one thing which may be prophesied with absolute certainty, is that this school will be "non-sectarian." Practically, this means that it will be irreligious. There is no middle ground.

MILITARY METHODS

If we are not alert, we may yet have in this land of the free, a system of education, interpreted by decisions of the Supreme Court, and enforced by military methods. For the present, the National University Bill is dead. But it is sure to be revived for the inspection of the next Congress. Perhaps it would be well for you to ascertain the views of your representatives in the House and Senate on this highly important matter.

SOCIOLOGY

Woman's Place

"WOMAN'S place," remarks Mr. Cecil Chesterton placidly, "is in the home." And the philosopher relapses into contemplation of the lucidly obvious. "But," he continues, "most of the arguments against suffrage are bosh. Women have as much intelligence as men, if not more. They show it by staying at home." Which is a characteristic thesis of Chestertonian philosophy—a bit confusing at first, like a fan of light suddenly thrown into your eyes, but useful, when properly shifted, to illuminate pitfalls along the road.

"SLAVE" OR LEADER?

We are not minded to weave an argument for or against the vote for women. That would lead to endless controversy by correspondence, and while paper and stamps are fairly cheap, time is not. But the statement may be allowed that "Women in Search of a Vote," seem to fall into two classes. A typical member of the first class is described by a writer in a current magazine. "A man," he reflects, "gives a woman all his love, all his thoughts, gives her his name and his home; only asks to work his brains out for her, only asks to see her happy. And she calls it 'charity,' calls herself a 'slave.' Give them the Vote," he concludes, "it's all they're good for." Fortunately, women of this class are not numerous. Unhappily, the few among us are very, very noisy. They claim to be the head and front of the "crusade" for the emancipation from the thraldom of man, of millions of women who would be shocked to learn that they are in a state of bondage. If they are the head, it may in charity be supposed, that they are a fever-racked head, a head in a delirium, which says very many unmeant, irresponsible things, and strives to break perfectly good lamp-posts and windows. But there is another class of seekers. Earnest, sane, usually well-balanced women compose this class. Able for the most part to take an unbiased view of life, they calmly plan to extend the right, or privilege, or burdensome duty of voting, to women. They do not think that they are either slaves or objects of charity, but they are well aware that there are many evils in the world, and they believe that they have been born to set them right.

REFORM THROUGH LEGISLATION

These women see, perhaps with keener vision than men, man's usual inhumanity to man, and particularly to woman. They know that it is always woman who bears the greater burden of man's wastrel life. Their ears are more open to the timid cries of the oppressed, to the sound of the weeping of little children, cheated by greed of their childhood. They can see tears trickling through closed fingers, pressed close to faces that would hide their shame. Because of her capacity for suffering in silence, woman can more easily recognize silent suffering, and if in relieving it she is more "emotional" than man, she is likewise less cruelly cautious. She sees the superficial wounds at least, on the body of humanity, wrought by intemperance and ruthlessness; and to heal them, she proposes to transfuse into public life, some of the sympathy and mercy which she has long exercised as an individual. That, mainly, is the reason why she seeks the vote; not as something particularly desirable in itself, but only as a means of doing wider good. But, it would seem, she purposes to reform the world not so much by the influence of her example, as by legislating evil out of public life.

STATUTE-MADE GOODNESS

The motive is excellent. But will the vote remedy the untoward conditions which by universal confession, exist in modern society? It is true that gross exterior disorders, suffered and fostered by men who make it their business to take advantage of the defenceless, can be most readily and completely done away with by the pressure of law, properly enforced. The validity of the principle so often enunciated by Leo XIII, that the State must protect the individual in those things in which he can not protect himself, is beyond question. But if forced, it becomes paternalism, if not tyranny, and to determine its applicability in a given case, is often a matter of extreme difficulty.

Often, the easiest way to dispose of a complex social question will be to pass a law about it. Quite as often, this is the worst possible method of curing the evil with which the law is concerned. Men should be temperate, just, merciful, in all things, but if they are not, statute law will not make them so. The evil lies deeper. It is rooted in the disorderly will, which legal enactments do not directly influence. At best, statute law can exercise upon the will only external pressure. It can impart to the will, per se, no internal, confirming motive.

INDIVIDUAL REFORMATION

Women have been notable sinners; it must be allowed, in embracing the theory that the social millennium is to be wrought by the State Legislature. Women in public life do not understand, apparently, that if you reform the individual, the community will reform itself, that the worst way of reforming a man is by hedging him about with laws which he is disposed to break, and that the only hope of reforming him lies in inducing him to put a motive into his life, strong enough to control his disorderly will. Thus do they mistake the province of the art and science of government. Their enemies argue that this characteristic error, betokening a lack of a certain variety of practical understanding, is of itself sufficient to warrant the exclusion of women from public life. In this, there is no attempt to force a solution of the vexed matter of the alleged "inequality" of the sexes. The contentiousness which has attached itself to this question is ridiculous. One might as well ask whether a linear yard were better or larger than a peck of potatoes. But the question does bring us back to the assertion made by Mr. Chesterton, that woman can do most good by staying at home. The seeming asperity of this statement is softened when St. Francis de Sales' explanation is added, that this is not because she is man's inferior, but because God seems to have wished it so.

THE PROTEST OF FEMINISM

"I could understand woman's protest," continues Mr. Chesterton, "if she complained that the walls of her home were too broad. I can not understand her when she complains that they are too narrow." For the walls of a home are as broad as the interests of the little lives growing up within their shelter, and its duties so manifold that few except the Saints fulfil them. What is the work of a mother's life? To be a help-mate to her life's chosen partner; to cooperate with omnipotence in the conservation of our race; to nurture and watchfully to protect the delicate, tender organism of the growing child; to turn the soul of the little one, this image of God, put into her care by God Himself, as the Body of His Son is put into the keeping of the priest, to high and holy thoughts, that will make him a man by whose presence the world will be bettered, and in the end a citizen of heaven: this is the glorious and exalted mission which God has given to mothers.

That a woman should cast a ballot, or interest herself in the public affairs of the community is, in itself, an indifferent matter. But that she should be entangled in an infinity of political and social questions, until at last she comes to believe that single-hearted devotion to her home and to her children is selfish and narrowing, is the culmination of that feminism which is destructive of the State and, in its nature, of morality as well. That even Catholic women are not free from these pernicious delusions, is proved by the fact that Catholic women, not many, thank God, have advocated them.

CLEANLY AND PURELY

"What good," asks Kathleen Norris, in that splendid little book, "Mother," "is learning or elegance of manner, or painfully-acquired fineness of speech, and taste, if you're not going to instil it into the growing plants, the only real hope we have in the world? . . . She doesn't strive (the motherly mother) to express herself through the medium of poetry or music or the stage, but puts her whole splendid philosophy into the nursery—launches sound little bodies and minds that have their first growth, cleanly and purely, about her knees."

It may be all very well for the "emancipated" woman to compose symphonies, or paint souls or, by her civic exertions, make her community another Spotless Town. But if she is content with this, her ideals are deplorably low. To care for "sound little bodies and minds that have their first growth cleanly and purely about her knees"—this is a more glorious work than to build a Parthenon, or to charm the world with the music of the chant of the morning stars as they sang together. They are the great conservers of the human race, these strong mothers of sublime self-sacrifice. There is something in their devotion that is almost divine. It is like God's love, tender and sheltering; our solace in this vale of tears, our reward exceeding great, in the world to come.

PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Pessimism on the part of social workers, fused with sentimentality, makes it increasingly difficult to state the true factors in present-day economic and sociological problems. Nothing is commoner than the vague yet impressive statement, that "millions of young women are employed in shops and factories." In a recent article in the Woman's Home Companion, Miss Ida Tarbell applies the critical test to this and similar exaggerations. According to the last census, there are just about eight million women and girls of all ages "from ten to a hundred," engaged in gainful occupations of all kinds: teaching, dressmaking, clerking, secretaryships and business. Only about one-fifth are "in shops and factories," and of this one-fifth, about one-half are "young women," that is, are under twenty-one years of age. Miss Tarbell finds that the average girl does not work over three years in the shop or factory. Then, in eight cases out of ten, she marries. While Miss Tarbell's views on the propriety of divorce in certain cases can not be accepted, she is quite clear that the vast majority of these girls stay married. These findings may be a trifle optimistic, but a little optimism is a sovereign corrective of the pessimism which seems to guide the pen of the average magazine writer on matters of sociology or economics.

Since March 1, when the federal statute prohibiting interstate commerce in certain habit-forming drugs went into effect, provision for the proper care of "drug fiends," has become a serious question in many parts of the country. In St. Louis, it is said, about twenty persons presented themselves at various hospitals for treatment in the first week of March. This treatment while simple and inexpensive requires a minimum quarantine period of from ten to fourteen days. On March 6, Governor Dunne of Illinois in a proclamation, designated seven State institutions in which the treatment will be given without cost. In Chicago, it is reported that the County Commissioners, to meet the emergency, will pass a special resolution authorizing the hospitals of the city and county to offer the treatment free of charge. It is now pointed out by experts in the United States Bureau of Chemistry that interstate commerce in several exceedingly dangerous narcotics can not be checked by the Harrison law. According to Dr. Bastedo of Columbia University, one of these drugs, which was unaccountably left off the proscribed list, is used in large quantities in the preparation of patent medicines.

The following letter was recently addressed to the Sister Superioress of a military hospital at Bethune by the Queen of England:

> I have learned through Dr. Martin of your noble and heroic devotion to our brave and unfortunate wounded soldiers, and it is with a heart full of gratitude that I beg you to accept my warmest thanks. I pray that God may reward you for the angelic care which you have lavished on our poor soldiers, and I shall never forget that it is to you. Madam, that they undoubtedly owe their life and the restoration of their health. I beg you, Madam, to accept the assurance of my highest esteem.

Meanwhile the Protestant Alliance, possibly as an offset to this and similar commendations, is striving to raise once more the old cry of "inspection of convents where England's daughters are held in chains." The Alliance, it is reported, while not strongly represented at the "front," is preparing a gallant army to repel the minions of the Pope, who, they assert, will presently swarm into England, under the leadership of Sir Henry Howard, the British Envoy at the Vatican.

Learned studies on the question of women in factories and the trades have been published, but until recently, little had been written on the subject of an occupation which engages most of the time of fifteen million women in America. The scene of this occupation is that chemical laboratory commonly known as the kitchen. The Syracuse Post-Standard, after protesting that "the kitchen needs no advocate and no defender," proceeds to assume the unnecessary rôle. "Good food makes happy homes, keeps families united, accomplishes wonders in keeping men from drink, and children from breaking down under the stress of modern education. Upon it [good food] hang the issues of life." The epicure! But impressive figures are to follow. In this workshop, "hundreds of millions of dollars worth of material, more or less raw, are made into a product which sustains tens of millions of human brains and bodies," in addition to a bone for the growing pup, and something suitable, a fish, perhaps, for the cat. Yet no workshop has received so little attention from the modern efficiency engineer. No factory would tolerate the primitive arrangements of most kitchens, "designed stupidly," as a recent Government Bulletin reports, "with no convenient access to pantries, store-rooms, cupboards, refrigerators, and dining-rooms." This Bulletin, "The Farm Kitchen as a Workshop," offers a number of suggestions to promote "efficiency" in the kitchen. It is to be hoped that "efficiency" in the kitchen is a more tolerable thing than what is usually styled "efficiency" in education. But if it is not, it will not be suffered long to encumber that domestic shrine. It will be house-cleaned out of existence. Unfortunately, no equally efficient method can be readily invoked to expel "efficiency" from the schools.

The Federal Industrial Relations Commission has come to New York, and has departed. Those who expected that the "revelations" made at its sessions would be "sensational," share their disappointment with many who thought that these "revelations" would be worthless. Mr. Walsh made one grievous error when he allowed Mr. Carnegie to conduct one session of the Commission, but in other respects proved himself a sane and able investigator. In an interview, published in the Kansas City Star, Mr. Walsh remarked that, although the Government had not yet concluded its investigations of the Rockefeller and Carnegie Foundations, this much "seemed certain: The Rockefeller Foundation is entirely without the realm of Government control."

> As an interlocking system, it beats anything the railroads or banks ever devised. Whether its enormous powers are such as can be permitted safely in the hands of any authority less than the Government of the United States, is a question which will form an important part of the Commission's forthcoming report. I am inclined to believe that these powers can not be exercised under the American theory of government.

With this last statement, Professor Kirchwey of the Columbia Law School is in accord. Mr. Walsh took advantage of his interview to state an anomaly in connection with these Foundations, which has occurred to many.

> Mr. Rockefeller could not tell the Commission why he did not use his profits to pay a living wage, instead of using them in the distribution of a charity which many Americans have come to look upon as a menace.

It is suggested that Dr. Eliot be called upon to give this explanation. If he can not, the world may rest assured that a solution of the matter is not possible to the mind of man.

A correspondent of the London Tablet notes twenty-four varieties of belief and practice current among High Church Anglicans. He derives these varieties from those advertising columns of the Church Times, wherein ecclesiastics of the Established Church publish their "wants and their qualifications." Here are the specifications laid down in some of these advertisements:

> 1. Not extreme. 2. Moderate High Church, with broad sympathies. 3. Vestments, but moderate. 4. Daily Eucharist, linen vestments. 5. Bachelor priest. 6. Evangelical, loyal to vicar. 7. Moderate, Eastward position. 8. Definite views. 9. Moderate High Church. 10. Sound Churchman. 11. Churchman, five points. 12. Eastward position, lights. 13. Catholic. 14. Thorough Catholic, daily Eucharist. 15. Liberal Evangelical. 16. Catholic, no vestments. 17. Catholic-minded. 18. Definite Churchman. 19. Evangelical Catholic. 20. Earnest Churchman, moderate views. 21. Catholic views, six points. 22. Strong Churchman. 23. Linen vestments.

Advertiser No. 24 seems to have a poor opinion of his brethren. He shares the suspicions of Catholics, that the adherents of the other twenty-three varieties are only "playing at being Catholics," by dressing themselves in vestments, and swinging censers:

> 24. The whole Faith taught and practised, no Anglican or High Church compromises; the Mass supreme, reservation and incense.

When some years ago, the Prig suggested that the best way of finding out the religious views of an Anglican community, was to consult, not the reading matter of their publications, but the advertisements, he was thought, and was said, to be most cruelly satirical. Perhaps; but the Tablet correspondent has shown that the method of the Prig will really show what varieties of doctrine, opinion, fancy and practice flourish in the Establishment.

The legal measures recently taken against an anti-Catholic publication, have, in general, met the approbation of the public. But a religious weekly, published in New York, while disclaiming belief in the charges circulated by that vile publication, seems to suggest that some explanation concerning convents is due the public. If this publication is seriously seeking information, it may be suggested that the "Catholic Encyclopedia" can be found in any public library which has emerged from the Stone Age. But the general public can not, and in all probability does not, think it incumbent upon Catholics to review this mass of slander. The Duke of Norfolk once refused to take the chair at a meeting of Catholics who proposed to protest against the slanders of a notorious "ex-priest," because in his opinion, such a meeting would indicate that his fellow-citizens took this unclean bird seriously:

> It is because I thank God with all my heart that in His mercy I am a Catholic; because I glory in belonging to the old Faith; because I love and reverence our priesthood as I do, that I decline to be driven to bay by accusations which no decent man would listen to, no generous man believe.
> Thank God, two of my sisters are nuns. Thank God, one of my wife's last acts in this world was to found a convent. Am I wrong in thinking that Sheffield would be ashamed that I should have to defend their fair fame before my fellow citizens?

"Accusations which no decent man would listen to, no generous man believe." These words are commended to the consideration of a Southern college professor who, in the Presbyterian of the South, writes his approval of the high regard for truth current among defamers of the Church.

In his Cincinnati speech, ex-President Taft is reported to have recommended the establishment of a National University. It is particularly needed, he thinks, to secure for the grade schools, "proper scope, efficiency, thoroughness and economy." In other words, Mr. Taft believes that this proposed bureaucratic university is the only power that can force upon the schools a "standard." From Mr. Taft the country has come to look for opinions well-reasoned, and expressed modestly but convincingly, and the ex-President rarely fails to live up to his reputation. In the present instance, while his usually clear judgment may have failed him for once, comment might be more fitting, when what Mr. Taft really said has been ascertained. But the New York Sun, a journal usually found on the side of common-sense in educational matters, speaks right out in meeting to the following effect:

> Build up the Bureaucracy. . . . Put the iron collar of standardization, uniformity, dull and deadly, on the schools. Swell the megalomaniacal Bureau of Education into "a national university." If schools are to be standardized, why not colleges? How would Professor Taft like to have the Barnacles and the Tite Barnacles of Bureaucracy fumbling and fuming over the New Haven institution where he occasionally lectures?

After all, is the Government to do everything for us? Can nothing be left to the initiative and skill of the individual citizen? If the educational and sociological cranks with whom the country is infested are allowed to go much further, there will soon be less home rule in the United States than in Ireland. It is about time for a return to some realization of the constitutional principle, that powers not expressly granted to the general Government are reserved to the several States.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable to Teachers and Students in Catholic Schools only.

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

5% First Mortgage Notes

Catholic Church Property in Chicago

Executed and signed by the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, by James Edward Quigley, Archbishop

These Notes are a direct obligation of the Catholic Bishop of Chicago, a Corporation Sole, created by a special act of the Legislature of Illinois, and legal title to all the property covered by these Mortgage Notes is vested in this Corporation. These Notes are secured by First Mortgage on certain and specified pieces of property. They are further secured by all the church property of the Archdiocese of Chicago. Principal and interest are absolutely secured and the Notes will be converted into cash at their face value by us at any time you may wish to realize upon them. A safe, sound, and convertible investment.

In Denominations of $500 and $1000

Maturing in one to ten years

Maturing interest coupons and principal Notes may be deposited in your own bank for collection or forwarded direct to us. Just as secure—just as safe and in every essential detail just as desirable as placing your money in the best-managed savings bank in the United States.

The Security Increases Each Year

The value of the Catholic Church property in the Chicago Archdiocese has kept step with the vigorous growth of new parishes. The real estate covered by these Notes is located in some of the choicest sections of the city of Chicago and is increasing in value. Though a certain number of the Notes are payable annually, none of the security is to be released until all Notes shall have been paid. In this way the security behind this investment becomes relatively greater each year. Send today for full information, details, etc. We will be pleased to submit a full description of the Notes.

Redeemable at Face Value

These Notes will be redeemed by us at their face value if you wish to convert the Notes into cash. We will charge only a small sum for redeeming them.

Any Banker in Chicago can inform you of the character of these Notes and will also acquaint you with our standing.

We will be pleased to mail you a full description of these Notes. Send today for full information, details, etc.

Ask any Chicago banker if he considers these Notes a safe and very desirable investment.

105 N. Clark Street Dept. 7403 Chicago, Ill.

Credentials?

Before you invite a stranger to your home you ask for his credentials! Do you ask for the credentials of the refrigerator you place in your home to which you entrust the food you eat?—upon which your health depends?

Physicians declare that many cases of serious illness can be traced directly to unsanitary refrigerators. Be safe—Ask for credentials before you buy a refrigerator.

McCray Sanitary Refrigerators

offer you a long list of reliable credentials—from the finest residences, hotels and restaurants, and the best Catholic Institutions—where perfect refrigeration is demanded.

Dear Sirs:

Of my own free will, and through a motive of gratitude, I unhesitatingly endorse the course in Harmony and Composition, as taught by Prof. C. W. Wilcox, A.M.

I have never found in any of the modern authors on Harmony (and I've studied them all) anything like the method and order displayed in the "Wilcox Course," and certain it is, that I've never derived from them a tithe of the benefit that the "Wilcox Course" has given me.

CATHOLIC MIND

Have Been Circulated Since June Last

Are you among those who have actively helped in thus propagating the Truth? These attractive pamphlets are now everywhere recognized among the most effective weapons the militant Catholic has. Published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. The price is nominal. Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

Do Jesuits teach that the end justifies the means? The Rev. Robert Swickerath, S.J., refutes the calumny once more in

THE JESUIT MYTH

Has the State the right to execute criminals? Is it wise to do so? There is a vast deal of sentimentality and sophistry being published nowadays in answer to these questions. The Rev. John J. Ford, S.J., gives the correct doctrine in

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

In the concluding paper of the number Father Fisher shows that those who defend the war censorship of to-day are bound in consistency to admit the justice of the Church's Index.

This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.
The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

CHRONICLE

The War.—Steady though slight progress is reported to have been made by the Allies in the western theater of the war. The Belgian army has been pushing forward along the Yser, but elsewhere fighting has been confined to artillery and gunboat fire. South of Ypres the British have gained, lost and regained ground at St. Eloi. They seem to have consolidated their new positions. The French have been successful north of Arras at Notre Dame de Lorette, and in the Champagne district, in the vicinity of Perthes, Souain and Mesnil. In the Argonne and Lorraine, notwithstanding severe engagements, the situation is practically unchanged.

Belgium and France

The battle line in Poland remains what it was a week ago. In spite of many engagements neither side has gained any notable advantage. Osowiec has shown no signs of weakening under the German bombardment, and the advance on Warsaw is as remote as ever. The Russians captured Memel, a city in the northeastern corner of East Prussia; the Germans retook the place, however, on March 21, after a battle near the city, followed by sharp fighting in the streets. Poland is again being made to suffer the awful ravages of war. Germany has carried out her threat to exact the threefold reprisals, mentioned in our German chronicle, from the Russians. Report has it that already 95 Polish towns and larger villages have been destroyed, and 4,500 smaller villages have been devastated, of which 1,000 have been burned. These figures come from Petrograd.

Poland

The campaign in Galicia, though marked by bloody fighting, has not undergone any serious modification. Many battles have been fought; in most cases, however, the details are meager and too uncertain for an authentic report. Przemysl, the Galician fortress, fell to the Russians on March 22, after a heroic defence of many months against great odds. The ammunition of the Austrians gave out, and a sortie was attempted; this failed, however, and the garrison surrendered.

Galicia

After a temporary lull operations were again resumed in the Dardanelles on March 18, when the allied fleet entered the strait and began a bombardment by direct fire on the inner fortifications, and especially of fort Kalid Bahr. The Turks replied vigorously, and are said to have disabled two cruisers. Floating mines, according to the British Admiralty reports, proved even more effective. Set adrift in the swift current, they were carried down stream into the area that had already been cleared, and resulted in the sinking of one French and two British battleships. Reports from Berlin and Athens differ as to the extent to which the fortifications have been damaged. In spite of the losses of the Allies, the attack on the strait is still continuing.

The Dardanelles

The negotiations that have been under way between Italy and Austria seem to be barren of results. No result has been forthcoming from the pressure which for some time has been brought to bear on the Dual Monarchy apparently by both Germany and Italy. Austria is firm in her refusal to cede the provinces of Trent and Triest, although there seems to be a disposition on her part to give up both places when the war is over, in case Italy continues her policy of neutrality to the end. The frontier is too valuable from a military standpoint, so it is reported, for Austria to think of parting with it at present. Meanwhile the Italian newspapers are talking of Italy's sacred aspirations toward national unity, of her obligation to profit by her actual military and diplomatic advantages, and of the opportuneness of the moment of departing from what she calls her long-continued policy of self-sacrifice in the interests of peace. There are many indications that Italy is preparing for war.

During the week the correspondence between the United States and Germany, France and Great Britain was made known. It consists of five notes. The Order in Council was also sent by the Allies to Washington. The outcome is simply an utter failure on the part of the United States to effect any modification of the conditions which are seriously interfering with the trade of neutral nations, and especially the trade of the United States. Germany agreed to accede to the American suggestions, but conditioned her agreement on certain concessions to be made by the Allies. France and Great Britain have not only refused to adopt our plan or make the concessions, but have published the details of the reprisals by which they declared some time ago they intended to reply to the war zone operations of the German submarines. France and Great Britain have proclaimed what is practically a blockade of an unprecedented type. Germany is to be cut off from all commerce. No goods of any kind are to be allowed either to enter or leave Germany. No merchant vessels carrying goods destined for German ports, or for neutral ports but for German use, or carrying goods that are German property or of German origin, or goods laden at a German port, are to be allowed to proceed on their way. They must discharge all such goods in a British port, except in the case where the vessel receives a pass allowing her to proceed to a neutral port, which is to be specifically designated. Large discretionary powers are given to the officials of the prize courts to deal with such goods as shall have been discharged, in order that the demands of justice and the interests of neutrals may be safeguarded. The sphere of operation of the blockade is restricted to European waters, including the Mediterranean. The United States is certain to make representations, perhaps, however, only when occasion arises, both in the interests of her trade and also as a protest against the arbitrary setting aside of the rules of international law. Her voice, however, will have no other effect than to lay the foundation for the recovery of damages when the war is over, and to free herself from any appearance of acquiescence in the action of the European Governments.

Blockade of Germany

France.—A bill to raise the limit for the issue of the Treasury defence bonds by one billion francs was unanimously passed in the Chamber of Deputies on March 18. The Minister of Finance, M. Ribon, took the occasion to lay before the House a statement of the financial conditions of France. The great difficulties which in the beginning faced the Treasury are now being successfully overcome. The manner in which the people have taken the defence bonds has surpassed all expectation. "If it is possible to administer wisely the finances of the country," he said, "the merit is that of the entire people. It is the little savings in the woolen stockings which have come to the aid of the country. The gold has come in the beginning not from the large cash boxes, but from pocketbooks. The river is composed of little brooks." The national defence bonds had yielded up to March 12 the sum of 3,862,000,000 francs. Alongside the prospect of larger expenses, owing to such new operations as the expedition to the Dardanelles, he believed that there were reassuring indications of a restoration of the business of the country. Besides the increase in direct taxation, the revenues from indirect taxation are being increased, while the customs deficit is diminishing. The foreign trade statistics of France for the first two months of 1915 show a decrease of 632,000,000 francs as compared with the statistics of 1914, while the decrease of the first five months of the war was at the rate of 820,000,000 francs a month. These figures are taken to indicate a revival of trade. A discussion was likewise introduced into the Chamber of Deputies concerning a new law for the protection of owners in the case of securities lost through the occupation of French provinces by the Germans. It was said that the total value of such securities is so important as to constitute a formidable loss to French investors.

Financial Betterment

Germany.—A stormy scene took place in the Reichstag March 20. It was occasioned by the military reprisals determined upon to end the acts of Russian vandalism said to have taken place in East Prussia. The German official announcement stated that during the first invasion 10,000 houses had been burned, 2,000 non-combatants murdered and 4,000 carried off into Russia; and that during the second invasion 4,000 of the 15,000 civilians who had remained in the province until November were either murdered or dragged away and no fewer than 81,000 private dwellings systematically plundered. Valuables and furniture are said to have been sent to Russia by rail. About the same time it was stated that bands of Russians had again broken into the northeast section of the province and burned houses and villages. In reprisal German military authorities declared that for every German village destroyed three Russian villages must be given up to the flames and that for the damage done in Memel Russian government buildings must be laid low. The Socialist Representative Ledebour declared that he was horrified at this decree and Liebknecht shouted "It is barbarism!" This episode called forth an uproar in the House. The Nationalist leader Bassermann answered that such reprisals were indeed to be regretted. "But if the Russians set fire right and left and violate our women, are we then to demand that our military officers must not take such measures as will put an end to this inhuman warfare."

German Reprisals Discussed

The Centrist Gröber then rose to say that military authorities should not be hindered from taking the strongest measures which international law permits, if forced to such a course by Russian acts. Ledebour's criticism was declared unconstitutional and Herr Scheidemann, in the name of the Socialist party, stated that the speaker had made these remarks on his own responsibility and that he alone was to be held accountable for them and not the party. The Vice-Chancellor and Minister of the Interior, Herr von Delbrück, thought it was not becoming his position to take farther cognizance of the remarks than to say that they were "insulting and directed against the illustrious leader of the German army." The war, he said, was "offering new proof to the enemy of the economic and moral invincibility of the German people." It was evident, therefore, that the Reichstag considered itself justified in leaving to the military authorities all decision regarding the morality of the reprisals in question, which were looked upon as precautionary acts.

Great Britain.—The attitude of the United States toward British reprisals is causing much discussion. Some of this is heated and some calm. The general condemnation of Great Britain's action by our own papers is noted with regret and the opinion is ventured that our position is founded on a misapprehension. The more important British papers declare that it is England's purpose to respect the rights of trade "as far as the manifold necessities of their own military position allow." The claim is set forth that, though at first blush England's reprisal-measures may "be regarded as a departure from old practice," yet they "can be reconciled with fundamental principles of international law as applied to the wholly new state of circumstances which have arisen in the present struggle." Americans are reminded that "the adjustment of old principles to new conditions is of the essence of legal progress." A case in point is the doctrine of the continuous voyage elaborated by us in the "Civil War." The apologists for the reprisals set forth that in the present struggle the forces are largely conscript armies, and thus the old distinction between armed forces and the civil population is obliterated. The "army is the people in arms, and food for the people is necessarily to a great extent food for the army." Moreover, the German decree of January 25, putting all grain and flour under Governmental control, makes the German Government the consignee of all, or practically all, the imported foodstuffs. Then again, Germans, it is urged, should not object to the British measures, for two of their Chancellors, Bismarck and Caprivi, defended the seizure that England is insisting on. No reliance is put on any guarantee that Germany gave or would give, for England, it is stated, has no reason to believe that promises would be kept. The Times closes a singularly well-written article on the subject with these rather remarkable words:

America and British Reprisals

Under the guidance of men like Bright and W. E. Forster, who understood the greatness and the value to mankind of the ideals for which the North was fighting, the British democracy did not scrutinize too closely the acts of a kindred people struggling for its life. Therein they showed the large wisdom and the large generosity of their race. May they not hope today, when they have been plunged against their will into a conflict yet more deadly, for aims which are not less high, that America will do unto them as, in the day of her visitation and of her trial, they did unto her?

A recent Times has a striking editorial on a communication from a British officer "who has been much in contact with the French." The gist of the officer's message is that "France is at war as a nation," and that England must realize that she is "not less in for it" than France. This premised, the officer insists that it is most important "to inflict a decisive defeat on the enemy in the field before the next harvest restores their strength and confidence." The Times declares that this plain warning is very badly needed, for "the nation as a whole does not realize that it is at war as the French nation does." The House of Commons gets a drubbing for wasting time over trifles, and is reminded that to wrangle over boys on farms and such like incidents is unreal and ridiculous. The continual danger of strikes is causing much uneasiness, especially since "important munitions of war urgently needed by the army and navy" are apt to be held up, with consequent danger to the safety of the soldiers and sailors. "How are we to fulfil our obligations to our allies," exclaims the paper, "if they (employers and employees) persist in keeping up the sordid quarrels of which they are so fond in times of peace?"

Doubts and Difficulties

Ireland.—Speaking at a National Volunteer demonstration in Belfast, Mr. Dillon defended the wisdom of Mr. Redmond's policy in advising Irishmen to fight with England in the present war. The glory and military knowledge Irish recruits would win would prove an irresistible power at the back of the Irish Party in any struggle that might be forced on them in the future. And they were prepared for such a struggle:

The Nation Indivisible

> Assembled in the Celtic Park of Belfast to-day we tell all whom it may concern that, while we are willing to travel on the road to conciliation, always on the condition that other parties enter on that road to meet us, we will never consent—and I say it here in the face of you, the Volunteers of Belfast, who may yet have to make good my words—we shall never consent to divide this island or this nation, and we shall never consent to allow any section, clique, or faction to rule the people of Ireland.

He added that the opponents of Mr. Redmond's war policy were "cranks and soreheads," though he admitted they were numerous. His further statement that the majority of Irish-Americans supported Mr. Redmond in the matter is not in accord with their newspaper organs and public pronouncements. The usual St. Patrick's Day banquets and speeches under the auspices of the Irish Party were discontinued this year.

Two bacon and meat supply factories, established a few years ago in Tipperary and Wexford, have doubled their output in the last year and declared handsome dividends. Other industries, especially in textiles, have also prospered during the year, with the result that there have been many recent prosecutions for the sale of bogus "Irish made" materials, and the adulteration of inferior British or foreign goods with Irish. The stress caused by the war and the increased demand by the War Office for food and clothing materials, occasioning both a large rise in prices and considerable fraud, are accentuating the sufferings of the poor in many localities. Generally there is no lack of employment, but employers in town and country can not afford to pay the wages which the inflated prices of coal, food and other necessaries make needful for decent living. Meanwhile the Government has withdrawn its usual grants for national libraries, museums and various other public purposes.

Industries and Indigence

Mexico.—This week the story of Mexico is the same as it was last week. There were battles and robberies and murders and taxation and protests and promises of amendments and all those other atrocities and stupidities to which the civilized and intelligent world is trying to accustom itself. Mexico's cause seems hopeless. A private letter, written from Mexico City on March 15, throws a lurid light on conditions under Obregon. The writer, an American of five years' residence in the capital, first pays his respects to the leaders of the factions, insisting that the outrages narrated in our papers have actually taken place, and then proceeds as follows:

The Week and a Letter

When I walked down the Avenue Juarez the other day the street was filled with hundreds of the very poor clamoring for bread; in front of the hotel which is the headquarters of the commander-in-chief of the garrison of the city, there were scores of Yaqui Indians drawn up, rifles ready, as if they meant business; around the corner a squadron of Yaqui cavalry waited, rifle on thigh; two armed automobiles stood in the middle of the street, their guns commanding the broad thoroughfare; they looked solemn and impressive in their dull gray paint, soldiers peering through the loop-holes. I thought to myself of the terrible havoc they were capable of spreading among a crowd of unarmed people—they looked so exceedingly, so terribly business-like. And then my eyes wandered upward to the balconies crowded with laughing officers (doubtless jesting together about the helpless demonstration of the suffering people of this city), and then higher still to the place where the red, white and green tricolor of Mexico blew from the staff and I saw that the flag was in tatters, and it seemed so symbolic, the flag of their country torn and trampled under foot by the smallest percentage of the population (even as it was actually trampled under foot at the Convention of Aguascalientes a few months ago by the representative of Zapata and his followers who referred to it as a rag), the country starving and in ruins and these men dashing up and down the principal avenues in stolen automobiles, levying extraordinary taxes on merchants and others. . . . You will have read in the press of the scores of outrages committed by General Alvaro Obregon since his advent in our midst as ruler of the destinies of the half million souls that are here. No doubt the versions as they reached the United States were garbled, but they can not have exaggerated the terrible condition of affairs which exists in Mexico City, since Obregon and his 25,000 Yaqui Indians occupied the city. . . . You have heard of the arrests of the Catholic priests after he had invited them to the Palace to confer with him as to the best means of relieving the necessities of the poor, who were on the verge of absolute starvation. . . . I have not space sufficient to tell of the manner in which he tried to arouse the masses to rise up and sack the city, when he was refused the money. . . . He seized one of the principal churches of the city and converted it into a club for the local branch of the I. W. W., which is perhaps one of the worst products of the revolution. . . . His men sacked churches in different parts of the city and carried off all the silver and brass ornaments, candlesticks, chandeliers, etc., on which they could lay hands. His continued imprisonment of the priests has made Mass impossible for over a fortnight. Paid gangs of ruffians picked from the ranks of the I. W. W. attacked processions of women marching in an orderly protest against the treatment of the clergy.

The Yaqui cavalry charged assemblages of men. He permitted, encouraged demonstrations of the I. W. W., who marched through the streets calling on people to rise up and destroy property, to sack and to loot. His officers cheered to the echo speeches made by the leaders of the I. W. W., in which people were told that "Christ was a mere invention of the Mexican clergy who used the myth to exploit the ignorance of the poor." They cheered men like Salazar when he called upon the people "to attack the churches and tear down the silver images of Christ."

Rome.—Antonio Cardinal Agliardi died in Rome on March 20, in his eighty-second year. The dead prelate had a most distinguished career. Twelve years after his ordination he was sent to Canada, in a minor official position, and on his return to Rome was made secretary to the Propaganda. In 1884 Leo XIII created him Archbishop of Cæsarea, and sent him on a diplomatic mission to India in that year, and again in 1887. Later, in 1889, he was Nuncio at Munich, where he served till 1892, when he was transferred to Vienna. In 1896 he was recalled to Rome and elevated to the rank of Cardinal. It is reported that it was he who suggested that perhaps the belligerent nations would rest on their arms during the conclave which elected the present Pope, thereby testifying to the peaceful mission of the Holy Father. Cardinal Agliardi is the fourth of the Sacred College to die during the present pontificate. The others are Cardinals Ferrata, Di Pietro and Tecchi. There are now twelve vacancies in the College. The Holy Father still preserves the utmost neutrality. His position, difficult by its very nature, has been made doubly so by the bitter attacks on him, emanating principally from France. Apparently there is an organized attempt to make French and Belgian Catholics discontented with the Vatican. Maeterlinck's impudent tirade overreached itself; its very insensate bitterness opened the eyes of many to the truth, and the speech of the wandering Fleming, who years ago forgot the doctrine of Christ which he would now teach His Holiness, has deeply offended many people.

Psychology of Gambling

IN common use, but rarely understood in its technical and proper sense, the phrase "psychology of gambling" merits attention and study. Psychology deals with mental processes as such, and the use of the term in connection with gambling suggests an examination of mental processes and emotional forces which come into play when man is engaged in games of chance. Man is a composite being. He is possessed of a soul, which we rather describe than define when we say that it is the "principle by which man lives and knows and desires." Likewise he is possessed of a body containing material forces and supplying material energy as an auxiliary for his many and varied mental operations. The rational soul is gifted with intellect and will, the former having for its object truth, the latter goodness. Emotional forces are found also in man, and play an important part in his mental, moral and physical well-being. By the proper exercise of rational control man is enabled so to coordinate his mental faculties and emotional forces as to effect a harmonious development of all his powers. A proper exercise of the emotions, in conjunction with other powers, moves the strong to help the weak; the wealthy to assist the needy, and the fortunate to provide for the less favored. An unbridled sway of the emotions leads to wanton destruction of life, liberty, happiness and property. Within their proper sphere and under a control wisely regulated the emotional forces are valuable assets, contributing largely to man's complete growth. When, however, they are allowed unrestrained sway, they prove to be serious hindrances, endangering, and ofttimes actually destroying man's solidarity.

Man is by nature a creature of thought. From a storehouse of ideas he forms his judgments, standards and principles. We are all character builders, whether consciously or otherwise, and the problems attending our intellectual and moral activities frequently call for highly concentrated application and study. Continued mental effort is arduous and can not be exercised indefinitely. To a greater or less degree restraint is exercised by the will over the emotional forces, while the attention is focused upon problems of thought. The rest we seek after hours of mental exercise is imperative for mental recuperation, and is needed to afford the emotional forces freedom from the inhibitory pressure exercised over them while we are mentally engaged. Released from marked restraining pressure, the emotions seek an outlet for expression; and the relaxation so sought is not healthy, unless it be rational.

The fatigued mind does not necessarily find relief only in a cessation of activity. Often a change of occupation is amply sufficient. To this may be traced the fact that gaming has been accepted generally from the earliest period of history as one of the most widely-known means of mental relaxation.

Gaming, as a healthy means to an end, namely, mental rest and relaxation, needs no defence from a psychological standpoint; but continued participation in games of chance for the game itself, and for the pleasure afforded, is undeniably harmful. It destroys the mental stamina of the participant. The old adage, "anger sharpens the mind," has its limitations. Anger does not sharpen the mind in a rational sense. It rather distorts the vision, it magnifies the nature and extent of the alleged injury, and renders one incapable of analyzing conditions. A rational examination of the subject of disturbance is possible only before the dispassionate tribunal of reason. So, too, it is with the gambler. The ever-increasing desire for personal gain causes him to see upon a distorted retina only the outcome of a particular game, it blinds him to all else save his immediate personal triumph. The emotions are unrestrained and the rapid transition of feeling from one extreme to another presages mental, moral and physical deterioration on the part of the participant. From the standpoint of psychology alone, therefore, the gambling practice is reprehensible. No man can indulge in the practice of gambling habitually, and some men not even occasionally, without losing that "sound mind in a sound body," which is a fundamental requisite, demanded by the laws of psychology as a condition for healthy, normal progress.

From the moral standpoint, and in the earlier periods of history, healthy participation in games of chance had the approval and the encouragement of the nations of antiquity. Incorporated in the religions of the ancients, as well as in the laws of the people, chance continued to be an element of religion, law and sociability, until the decline of the nations of antiquity. The vicious gambling practices which came into vogue were subsequently condemned and prohibited, but without effect. With the advent of Christianity gaming practices were not distinguished from gambling, but were condemned and prohibited by early churchmen because they were considered, in themselves, outgrowths of paganism. In the spurious treatise "De Aleatoribus," attributed to St. Cyprian, the keynote of opposition of the Ante-Nicene Fathers to the practice was voiced in the main thought of the treatise, "esto potius non aleator sed christianus," and consistent with such view the Synod of Elvira (probably 305 A. D.) set forth the first declaration of the Church against the practice, as an organization.

With the overthrow of paganism as an organized opponent of Christianity, there were adopted gradually by the writers on morals, the distinction between gaming as a healthy pastime and gambling as a vicious outgrowth of gaming. This distinction, first appearing in the writings of Saint John Chrysostom, and repeated by John of Salisbury, was developed in its fulness by Saint Thomas Aquinas, who as the Prince of the Schoolmen needs no introduction to a student of scholastic theology or philosophy. The healthy aspects of gaming were set forth by him in his treatment De Ludo. His position is simply this, that gaming as a means to an end is recreative and useful, since it affords a proper field for the activities of the tired mind or wearied body. Gambling, however, the saint calls a vicious outgrowth of gaming, and, since it entails an immoderatus amor habendi, it is a practice to be avoided by all. (Summa Theologica, 2-2, Q. 118, Art. 1-8.) Gaming as a means to recreation is quite different from gambling indulged in for itself. The former is good, the latter is evil. The analysis of the subject from a psychological and ethical point of view, as presented by St. Thomas, suggests fundamental principles, which could well be applied with effectiveness to any problem concerned with the practice of gambling. From the psychological, ethical and sociological standpoint the practice is one which should meet with whole-hearted condemnation from sensible people in all walks of life.

The Young Man and Diplomacy*

DIPLOMACY is not yet a career in the United States, but approaches it more nearly than ever before. Despite the losses in personnel consequent upon changes of administration, and the waste of public money involved in training a man to a difficult profession, only to throw him aside when he is fitted for his task, the American diplomatic service has steadily progressed in efficiency during the past twenty-five years. The need of a corps of experts in international affairs is becoming daily more evident to the thinking American who understands his country's relation to the rest of the world and the vast changes brought about by the world-war. Thus, the present administration, in spite of general belief to the contrary, has so made appointments that the majority of our diplomats now charged with the enormous and delicate task of caring for belligerent interests in Europe and of safeguarding our own, are tried men chosen for past services to the nation, irrespective of political party.

Our diplomatic service is, as has been observed by several able writers in recent magazine issues, our "first line of defence." It is in theory, and is becoming in practice, a body of highly-trained experts. Its work is not primarily political and in this sense different from the consular service—an error of public opinion which has always hampered the senior branch. The two branches can no more be separated than, to use a homely example, the sales manager for a district and the agencies of his firm throughout that district. The manager may have more to say about the policy of the firm or company than the local agents, but they work together, each on his own line.

The diplomatic representative of the United States is the guardian, in the land to which he is accredited, of his country's interests. He must be alert, highly-educated and well balanced in judgment, cool, fearless, appreciative of the point of view of others, tactful, patient and quick-witted. He must have first of all a thorough knowledge of the principles on which our Government was founded, and of the development of our national institutions, good and bad. He must be widely versed in the national and sectional life of our country, and understand our varied interests in their true relations at home and abroad; he must know those forces which have made us what we are, and are now creating a nation, and which in our generation are reacting upon Europe and the rest of the world. It is not sufficient for him to be merely a patriotic American, though it is essential that he be so, for the glamor of European life is great. He must understand the country to which he is accredited, as well as he does his own; moreover, he must understand what outer forces may affect his usefulness in his immediate sphere. He must be, in a true sense, a historian, and go to the very foundations of international intercourse. It is, in my opinion, not essential that he belong to the political party in power, for he is serving the nation, not a party or a State or a section of the country, still less a person, be that person the Secretary of State, the President or a political leader. Least of all is he serving private commercial interests. To the national representative are given aides from the lower ranks of the diplomatic service, and from the navy and army, as well as commercial experts. These officials, sharing in different degrees in his privileges, form his intelligence service. They are his ears, eyes and hands, and submit their observations and deductions to his judgment. They can be of the greatest assistance in his work of protecting and extending American interests, or they can, and sometimes do, through lack of understanding of their duties and hearty cooperation, hamper his work intolerably. Under our present system of appointment to specific posts, too often, still, through political influence, it is difficult for the State Department to come to the assistance of the nation's representative and change or withdraw such an inefficient subordinate. Around this group of officials revolves the consular corps, spread through the country in its principal ports and places of commerce, specializing again in matters of commercial interest and guarding the immediate and local personal or business interests of their nation. The consular service can not be separated from the diplomatic service. It is an integral part of the same national intelligence bureau. Consuls should take their general policy from the diplomatic representative, who in turn is responsible to the President through the Secretary of State.

Assuming that we have a young man, presumably a college graduate with some years of professional or business life in one of our great centers, and a sound knowledge of languages, ancient and modern, who fully realizes the qualifications necessary to represent his country eventually; assuming that he has been formally presented to the State Department as a candidate, has passed his examinations and has received his commission from the President, under the Seal of the United States, appointing him "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," to be a junior Secretary of Legation or Embassy, he will, for at least thirty days be attached to the Department of State for special instruction. He will then proceed to his post by the shortest route, reporting his arrival and drawing on the Department, when authorized, for his traveling expenses at the rate of so many cents a mile. He will report at once to his chief of mission, who will assign him his special routine duties. The daily work of every legation and embassy is divided among the secretaries. There is even in the smallest missions, a vast deal of correspondence: letters concerning business opportunities, complaints, requests for an infinite variety of information, consular correspondence, passports, personal interviews with resident and traveling Americans (the most exacting and critical of all people), preparation of correspondence with local officials or with the Foreign Office, despatches and code cables to and from the State Department, reports on special subjects for the Department, for Congress, for Commissions or Chambers of Commerce, for the Department of Agriculture, of Labor and Commerce, etc., all these make a full day in the dullest season, and in times of stress may overwhelm the most strenuous worker. I venture to say that no European service could have stood the strain suddenly thrown upon ours by this war, under the same conditions. When our young secretary has been assigned his normal work, he makes, with his chief, his official calls on the Foreign Office and principal officials, on the Dean of the diplomatic body of the capital, and exchanges calls with every member of each foreign embassy and legation. Next he will be invited by the official world, and these entertainments are of vast importance, for through this medium he learns to know the men with whom his official duties bring him in contact, as he could never know them in an office chair and discussing business.

From then on a large part of his time is taken up in social engagements. This is the side of his duty which calls for a clearer judgment on his part than any other, lest he truly lapse into utter frivolity and confirm the popular belief in the essential triviality of a diplomat's life. The greatest profit may be drawn from these social activities for his country, not because dinners and dancing make international friendships or advance commerce, but because the intimate life which these functions typify give the diplomat priceless opportunities to know from the inside, as it were, and off their guard, all classes of the people among whom he is living, and he may thus get at facts and real opinion of vast importance in subsequent negotiations.

It is of the highest importance, as we have all seen in recent international transactions, that the President should have at his disposal either in the Department of State or in foreign countries, a number of men whose integrity and practical and personal experience extending over many years, can be relied on to steer a safe and honorable course through selfish and conflicting interests. If, when an emergency arises, the service provided by law and supported by the taxpayer is inadequate to meet it, the fault lies primarily with its appointing power.

The chief arguments advanced against the field of diplomacy as a vocation are: the limited number employable in this branch of the public service; the insufficient remuneration, and the insecurity of tenure.

The first objection can not be overcome; the field is necessarily limited, but the national service rendered is of the highest, and the experience gained is of the broadest. The second is a difficulty that will be surmounted, I believe, in the not distant future, for public opinion expressed in the press and in Congress is growing more urgent in favor of relieving the diplomatic service, at least, of the burden of rental of offices and dwellings, and possibly also of entertainments now paid for out of the salaries allowed by the nation. At present no diplomat may hope for advancement after a certain point who is not independently wealthy, no matter what his services may have been, and this condition forces on the President the choice of men who are willing to spend their fortunes in return for the great prestige and prominence, political and social, which their position of privilege and honor at a foreign seat of Government may give them, or who, being wealthy, are sufficiently high-minded and disinterested to be glad to guard their country's interests at their own expense. This is a situation both dangerous and improper, and it is not relieved by the fact that the United States has been so fortunate as to possess many such high-minded public servants, nor by the fact that with all our handicaps the diplomatic service has guarded and advanced true American interests abroad in a manner which calls forth the admiration of those who have followed its history and made allowance for its restrictions. The third point, uncertainty of office, until the United States have acquired a national point of view, have understood international needs and adequately provided for a service to meet those needs, is a safeguard rather than a drawback. Until that time there is danger of narrowness, affectation of foreign rather than American ideas, stagnation and general inefficiency in the unassailable tenure of office of so small a body.

We are being sobered and broadened by the vast responsibilities of our position as the greatest non-belligerent in the world to-day, by our vitally changed relations with Europe and with Latin America, by the dangers as well as duties which encompass us on all sides, and we must come out of it, I think, with a clearer perception of our nationality and a more definite plan of action than we have ever had, for our development at home and abroad. In this new relation to the world our diplomats must play a leading rôle, as guides and teachers of our own people and as exponents of our civilization to our neighbors across the seas.

Teach the Children to Read

OF the many suggestions that have been made for the furtherance of the apostolate of the press, not the least practical, and certainly one of the most enduring, is the recent scheme to introduce into Catholic high schools and colleges the reading and discussion of some Catholic weekly. The proposal commends itself not merely for its immediate advantages, but also, and principally, because it opens a way for training our young people in a matter that is of supreme importance. An intelligent reading of current literature is undoubtedly most desirable. How many boys and girls go out from our schools with no interest in the newspapers and magazines save the sporting, fashion and fictional sheets; and to their shame be it confessed, with a furtive and only half restrained curiosity in the latest murder and divorce scandal? The morbid character of modern life is, of course, mainly responsible for this deterioration of taste. Nevertheless no slight share of the blame is to be laid at the door of our educational institutions.

During the years of their collegiate and academic courses the pupils are given a rather satisfactory training in secular subjects, and this in spite of many obstacles, such as partial lack of equipment, the absence of literary home traditions, and the utter disinclination for serious application to difficult tasks that is so characteristic of the student of to-day. As a rule also there are laid the foundations of an intelligent Catholic life through an understanding of the Church's doctrines. Moral development too is looked after, the heart is schooled and the will is strengthened to resist what is wrong and to strive for what is good. But it is rare to find graduates of our Catholic schools who have been taught to read newspapers and magazines.

As a consequence they find themselves at a great disadvantage, and instead of maintaining the high level that their alma mater fondly but not over confidently hopes for, they content themselves with fiction, which when it is not worse is generally of an ephemeral value. Events that are of national and international importance have no attraction for them. The editorial page of the dailies that form public opinion, is passed over assiduously and without even a regret. Subjects that touch the very springs of their Catholic interests leave them unmoved. Catholic activities and the possibilities and legitimate demands of the lay apostolate, which in other lands are the very staff of the Catholic's life, they neither care for nor understand. The habits and principles of right thinking, in which their teachers so laboriously exercised them, go to waste. They do not apply them to current problems, nor use them to test the rectitude of the statements of those irresponsible writers and thinkers who are moulding current thought. And the result? They take their opinions ready made.

Things would not be so bad, if they had learned the habit of serious Catholic reading. Were they careful to inform themselves from our representative weeklies, though they might not dare to pass judgment themselves, they would at least have correct views. Unfortunately, however, when the habit has not been cultivated in youth, it is seldom acquired in age. Those who have not brought, from the class and lecture rooms with their diploma, a habit of challenging public pronouncements, and testing them to see if they square with natural and revealed truth, will not, except in rare and isolated instances, begin to do so afterwards. In this matter, more perhaps than in most others, some initiation and training is necessary.

It would be unfair to ourselves to think that this defect is characteristic of ourselves alone. It is a national defect. It is more or less true of a large portion of the graduates of all our American colleges and universities. These, however, are making strenuous efforts to remedy the defect. In many schools there has been introduced a custom that has long existed in the better universities. Clubs have been formed in the colleges for the purpose of discussing the current magazines. High schools confine themselves for the most part to a single weekly which they discuss under the guidance of their teachers.

This practice can not be too highly commended. We might well adopt it ourselves. The correct and appreciative attitude toward the more serious and the more dangerous part of our journalism needs cultivating. Parents and pastors complain and not without justice that we do not teach the children how and what to read. In this matter they contend there is a crying need of training. Why do we not remove the reproach? In non-Catholic schools boys and girls are educated to read with pleasure and discernment such papers as the Literary Digest, the Outlook, the Independent and the Nation. Even in Catholic schools some of these papers have been made the medium of a course in reading. The choice might be happier, but the practice is excellent, and should commend itself to all Catholic teachers of older children. Apart from the supernatural means of grace, there is scarcely a means more likely to perpetuate the results of Catholic education, to foster piety and to make the Church's children what she has a right to expect that they shall be, than the regular reading and discussion in the school room of a representative Catholic weekly.

If such reading and discussion were customary, our teachers would not be called upon to lament that their work is almost entirely undone soon after the graduation of their pupils; and bishops and priests would have less cause to complain that graduates of Catholic colleges not only take little or no interest in Catholic thought and achievement, but are often decidedly un-Catholic in their viewpoint.

Three World Conquests

THE future historian, looking back over the course of the past centuries of Christianity, will be able to discern three great epochs. They will stand out like giant landmarks, each momentous in its importance for the destinies of the whole human race. The first will doubtless be the era of the Cæsars and the triumph of the early Church. The second will be the period of the barbarian invasions of civilized Europe and the reconquest of the world for Christ. The third we may regard as the time of which our own generation forms a part.

The great world war might naturally be considered the distinguishing mark of this last period. Yet such is not the case. It is only one of many, not less portentous, effects of a movement whose culmination had been reached before ever the fatal shot was fired by the youthful criminal in the streets of Sarajevo. He himself was but a product of the world-wide materialistic propaganda. The first mighty impulse of this movement had been given far back in the days of the Reformation. Since then it had grown like a wave before the wind, increasing in volume and destructive force till its toppling crest has now begun to crumble into ruin.

All three epochs, nevertheless, were characterized alike by vast world conquests. Two of these periods have passed into history and can now be studied in their completeness. In both we find a striking similarity in the action of God's Providence. In each a material conquest, most widespread in extent, was achieved by a power standing in opposition to the laws of God. In each a spiritual conquest followed, no less universal in extent, and brought to pass by a power which was not of this earth. Will the same course of events once more be repeated? Neither the action of man's free will nor the designs of God's Providence, the two determining factors of all history, can be foretold with certainty. But it is none the less possible to draw from the past convincing reasons for hope and confidence.

The first of the three world conquests began with the triumph of the Roman arms. We behold in the pagan Rome of old the very sublimation of purely material power. Beneath its art and literature, its glory and refinement, what leprosy and cruel corruption! "Without affection, without fidelity, without mercy," was the Apostle's characterization of that pagan civilization, delivered up in its pride to a reprobate sense and doing without remorse the things worthy of death. It was all a triumph of "the world," of the threefold concupiscence of fallen man. Yet God's dispensation made of it the preparation for the spread of His own Kingdom. The ends of the earth had been placed under tribute to Rome that Christianity might follow in the way of the marching armies. The roads built by the Roman legionaries had been laid straight and smooth for the feet of the Apostles. Little did the haughty Cæsars deem, as they looked upon the Christian victims staining the sands of the arena with their blood, that from those precious drops of life blood there should spring the conquering army of the Cross of Christ.

Splendid as was the first great triumph of the Church, and productive of all the wonders of God's grace in the hearts of men, yet it only delayed but did not avert the fall of that ancient civilization into which the vices of paganism had eaten deeply. The sanctity of the Church indeed had never failed through all these centuries and saints without number shone like stars in her firmament; but the earth in general required a renewal and the hour was at hand.

The second world conquest now followed. The deluge of barbarism swept like a tidal wave over Europe. Rough shod the savage hordes rode onward, regardless of ancient splendors, of the glory that once was Rome and the pride that had marked her conquests. New "lords of the earth," they had come to take their place at the banquet table. The Church was again to pass through new ordeals; but the Providence of God was not wanting. Amid the wreck of a world she alone survived, sublime in her beauty and strength, girding herself anew for the task of spiritual conquest and the social reconstruction of Christian civilization.

Wild and wilful children of nature, untamed and untutored, slaves to a cruel superstition, filled with the greed of pillage, with the lust of battle in their blood, the savage hordes that now repeopled Europe called indeed for all her patience and all her firmness, no less than for all her motherly love. To subdue their fierceness, to cultivate their minds by learning, to train their hearts to gentleness and form in them the likeness of the meek and humble Christ was indeed a long and weary labor. Yet never did the Church fail or falter. A second time she conquered the conquerors of the world.

Can the wonder, we ask, be thrice repeated? Nothing surely is impossible with God. A third period of world conquest is unrolled before us. Paganism has won its third great victory. The era of a triumphant materialism has been completed. It has passed into history like the conquest of the Cæsars and the smiting of the nations with the hammer of Thor. No Roman eagles, no trampling march of savage armies has marked its progress. It has taken place silently and often almost imperceptibly, by royal decrees and votes of parliament, in press and school and university, on the platform and the stage, in the home and in the workshop. Christianity at times was not even attacked. It sufficed to overlook Christ. The rest would follow. It did follow. Materialism became a god. Once more amid the universal desolation one power alone remains, uncompromising, untouched and uncontaminated by the spirit of the world. It is the same Church which of old resisted the pagan Cæsars and stood sublime above the deluge of the wild barbarian hordes, the Church which Christ has founded upon Peter, to which He promised His abiding presence and against which the Gates of Hell can not prevail.

Through all this period of stress and storm her purity of doctrine, indeed, had never suffered; but again there was needed a renewal of charity on the part of many of her members. Her mark of sanctity had never been lost. There were saints then as ever. But much that was defective and sinful in individual lives was swept away with the Reformation. There was a new intensity of faith whose effects we may confidently look forward to now.

The reign of that blindest of all blind superstitions, materialism, is passing: its sway over the minds of men has already begun to decline. Yet it is far from ended. The spiritual conquest of the world in the days of the Cæsars was not accomplished until all the strength of persecution had been put forth in vain. The total regeneration in spirit and truth of the wild hordes was the labor not of a decade of years, nor of a single generation, but of entire centuries. Victory came through tears and the blood of martyrs. We can not forecast the future. One thing we know: the "Great Advance" has sounded, the call to renew all things in Christ. Singly and unitedly, we must give to the task the best of our energies, Spe gaudentes, rejoicing in hope, looking forward to a third great spiritual conquest of the world.

Chances Lost and Won*

ONE of our oldest inconsistencies is our veritable passion for making laws. We like to feel that we are moving away from empty formalism, we like to assume that justice and equity mean more to us than the mere externals of the law; yet we take every available occasion to multiply these externals and to submerge equity in a flood of technical and unwieldy forms.

I have often wondered, as a matter of curiosity, just how much the good behavior and order in a Catholic community is due to legislation, and just how much to the direct influence of the Church through the confessional. I think the facts, if they could be gathered, would be extraordinarily interesting. After all, if a man is upright and honest for religious reasons, he very seldom has to concern himself with statute law. He might live his whole life through and never once come into conflict with the State. To the average citizen, it is enough to know that murder is morally wrong. He knows little and cares less about the methods of criminal trial and the penalties of the law. He has no thought of murdering. The same is true of the grosser forms of stealing. It is only the burglar who is interested in the kinds of evidence necessary to convict a thief.

If this is so evidently true of the broad moral lines, why is it not equally true of the finer distinctions? Is it not far more important to have the individual business man honest for good religious reasons than to threaten him with a hundred statutes? Of course, we must have statutes, just as we must have criminal law; but we must use common sense in making these statutes. They should be made to cover the exceptional cases rather than the general ones.

I know of an interesting story somewhat to this effect: A certain man had a mania for burning up his house after he had lived in it only six months. This happened with three or four successive houses, until at last the poor man's family decided they ought to "do something." They consulted a wise mental specialist, and finally decided to buy a very much smaller house than the former ones. Of course, he burned this one at the end of six months too. Thereupon his family bought a little log cabin with only one room. At the appointed date this also was burned. By this time, however, his family had decided to put the man into a sanitarium. There his mania was promptly cured.

It is not very difficult to stretch this odd episode to cover most of our "legislative cures" of to-day. A man has a mania for dishonest business. We shake our heads wisely and cut the size of his business in half by a "reform law." He is still dishonest. We cut down his business scope again and incidentally that of all the honest men at the same time. It is only after a good many sad failures that we wake up to the obvious truth and put the man in prison, where enforced meditation may work a real cure.

Now, the Church can use the confessional as a reform tool. She can pierce at once to the core of social disease, instead of inanely cutting off one privilege after another from really honest men. She can curb the abuse without limiting the just use of a natural right. She can exercise this sane, common-sense and effective influence over a great number in the community. But she can not exercise it over all. Over the hundreds of thousands of non-Catholics in this country she has no direct influence whatever. It is just at this point that the duty of the Catholic layman springs up. The layman comes in contact with people of every class. It is his support the Church demands. It is his personal direct influence on those immediately about him that must accomplish in the non-Catholic world what the confessional accomplishes for Catholics.

In these short papers I have sketched only in the vaguest outline some of the work to be done, a very few of the types of men and women we must meet, and a few possible ways of exerting our influence over them. I have mentioned a few of the mad homeopaths, but not all. Hundreds of high-minded, well-intentioned men and women are working blindly and without any sort of guidance to "uplift" society. And just because they are working blindly there is the utmost confusion and mutual contradiction in their methods. Writers, ministers, society dilettantes, labor agitators of all kinds, what are they but a very few types of those we must help.

And the poison-men, the real maniacs, the traitors to our highest confidence and trust—there are thousands of them, and no two placed in the same condition with the same moral question to face. Whether we like it or not, the modern conditions, the excessive division of labor, and the more minute division of business responsibility absolutely demand a new specialized interpretation of the old staunch morality. Contracts between labor and capital that would have been just two hundred years ago are not just to-day. Either the position of the capitalist or the laborer has changed. One or the other is no longer economically free. That means an entirely new moral question. It demands a new application of the old law. It is not morality that is changing, but the things we must apply it to; and what this new application must be is the great message of the Church.

We, who happen to be of the laity, must carry this message clearly and forcefully. Our responsibility is tremendous, and it is also entirely new. At no time in Christian history have so many been outside the direct moral influence of the Church; and at no time have the economic and social conditions demanded more piteously, more desperately, just the firm, clear moral help the Church can give. It is time to awake! We have slept long enough while the Church has called. Our greatest chance has come. If we win, it is because the nobility and the unselfishness of our mission has inspired us; but if we lose, it is only because we have slept while the Church has undergone her greatest struggle of all time. Shall we sleep on? Or shall we awake?

Inspiring Figures

A RENAISSANCE in the veneration of the Catholic women of the past is sorely needed. There was a reach, an exaltation, a wonderful love, a consuming flame of joy and devotion expressed in the old pictures and frescoes of the Holy Mother. It is lacking to-day. The modern world needs a touch of chivalry. The actuality of the Virgin-Mother should be accentuated, her young grace vivified. She was only a girl, scarce sixteen, when the Christ Child came, and the wondrous joy of a mother's love ran through and thrilled her being. Life sprang from life when that Boy smiled his first wee smile and a human, timid, faltering mother kissed his puckered mouth.

Clotilda, wife of Clovis, Queen of the Franks, should be rescued from a dim and hazy past and placed upon a new and brightened pedestal of homage. It was through her efforts that Christianity was given official recognition in the then pagan western world. The pageantry of kingly power must have appealed to that young girl, when first she left her mother's knee to find her fond barbaric lover. But steadfast and true, through the temptations of a conqueror's career she held her faith, till ultimately she saw her liege lord kneel in Christian prayer. Is it any wonder that those early folk wove fact and fancy into native song to preserve her sacred memory? Her husband cut his way through war to fame, she touched his life with glory. There is an opportunity for a skilful hand to freshen the outlines of the noble girl, and make her truly live again.

No mother of a wayward son can read of Monica without a tear. And she who prays, through the vigils of unending nights, that God may guide his guilty feet to cleaner paths, is cheered to know that God must hear, as first He heard in other times, in far off lands that woman's pleading for her boy. There is more dramatic force in the battle of women as exemplified in the early life of St. Augustine than in any fiction ever staged.

Women of accomplishment in the hours of doubt and despair, can find no surer example of what one woman can do than in the accounts of St. Catherine of Siena. Of extraordinary personal charm, of boundless enthusiasms, of unfailing devotion, she is one of the most brilliant types of feminine power in history's book. With no particular training for the work, with no family of influence to support her, she became a commanding figure in the political, civic and religious life of medieval Italy.

The youth of most of these heroines appeals to the imagination. Joan of Arc was seventeen when she donned man's attire and led her troops against the English foe. Viewing her story as calmly and impartially as a Catholic can, there is still an irresistible appeal in the triumphs of the fair maid. The fighting spirit of any true man rises as he reads her history. He wants to bare his breast for the arrows her's received. He longs to bathe in blood that perfidious crew who burned her at the stake. Flippant high-school misses intent upon dance and dress might study her career with profit.

And what a call to sanctity there is in the biographies of St. Gertrude and St. Teresa. In one, the calmness of the Teuton mold, in the other the temperament of the South. Yet both were educated, enlightened, charming, high-bred ladies, not just black-robed, uninteresting women. Their lasting and immortal work cries out aloud for emulation.

And so, on every page of the story of Catholic women of the past, shines out the name of some great soul to cheer and brighten life's hard way. In the main, plain folk they were, of common clay, who lived and breathed and did life's ordinary things, but did them in an extraordinary way, not legendary myths, not stories told, but palpitating flesh and good red blood. Da Vinci could, if he were here, paint all their outlines fresh and new, and Raphael could infuse the soul. But they are gone. Yet how they loved those gentle folk!

WILLIAM H. LEARY.

The Future of Dalmatia

DALMATIA is to the Serbian race what Brittany and Connaught are to the Celts. Its people, pushed to the seaboard by the inevitable advance of newer elements from the East, has kept a firm grip of its last stronghold and refused to be extinguished by Turk, Teuton or Latin. Like the Bretons and Western Irish, the Dalmatians are conservative and religious to an extreme degree. Like most seafarers their lives are bound up with the supernatural, and public acts of devotion to the Mother of God form a characteristic feature of their worship on shore. Naval experts commend the Dalmatians as the finest sailors in the world. Travelers speak of their simple, virtuous mode of life, and their generous hospitality to strangers. Dwellers among them remark on their piety, fidelity to Church rule, and peaceful disposition. They have been loyal subjects to the House of Hapsburg for many centuries, even though the call of the blood toward their brethren of an independent State has grown in strength with the decline of Turkish power in the Balkan Peninsula. In return for their loyalty the Dalmatians have no national concessions to register, such as Bohemia or Hungary managed to wrest from the Government of Vienna. Because of their very submission they were, perhaps, overlooked and despised. Although they made common cause with Croatia, they did not share in the economic and cultural advantages granted to Croatians.

Dalmatia lacks schools and railways, but, dissatisfied with her isolation, the younger generation has of late sought instruction in Croatian or Serbian centers, thus strengthening links of kindred, and imbibing new ideas of freedom and autonomy. The victories of the Balkan wars fanned the ever-present fire of patriotism into flame. The long-standing allegiance to an alien crown faded in face of the inspiring spectacle of a Serb State triumphant over the Mohammedan power that had weakened and enslaved the race. Memories of the battles in which Catholics and Orthodox stood shoulder to shoulder in defence of Christianity, while the rest of Christendom stood cravenly aloof, were revived with enthusiasm, and Dalmatia, as well as Bosnia, pointed proudly to the number of her volunteers in the Serbian Army of 1912. It availed little that the Austrian authorities in Zara prohibited flags on which was inscribed merely the national proverb: Brat je mio, koje vera bio! (A brother is dear, no matter of what creed.) The sentiment of race brotherhood could not be eradicated although it might be outwardly suppressed. Painful episodes in which the clergy and their flocks came into opposition occurred throughout the district where Serbian propaganda had taken deepest root.

A struggle akin to what is taking place in Ireland disturbs and distresses the people of Dalmatia. Fealty to the Austrian Emperor, so long part and parcel of their religious existence, has not been laid aside lightly. Newer claims, however, based on an ancient medieval tie, have been put forward with a fiery intensity that has led to acts of violence and crime, repudiated by all factors alike. The Dalmatians should not be condemned for the lack of union. For some the path of duty seems to lie in adherence to the more recent past; for others it takes the form of ardent belief in a national resurrection from a more remote past, in which, before the Mohammedan invasion, Serbians enjoyed a brief, brilliant tenure of empire. Two parties, therefore, have arisen in Dalmatia.

The aspirations of the one, the Serbian party, are well voiced by Ivo Chippiko, a writer and patriot of whom his country is justly proud. He says:

> We strain toward our Mother! The question of Dalmatia must not be kept in the background even now when so many larger issues are being debated. Strange views are enunciated in Italy. Do 180,000 Italians weigh more than 628,000 Serbians in Dalmatia? These Italians live in a compact mass in the towns where they have come to earn an existence in pursuits foreign to our own people. True, they are more advanced than we in many things, and their civilization has penetrated to a certain extent among us, but it has not affected the general character of our race. True, there are certain old monuments with the imprint of the Lion of Venice to be found on our shores, but what are these in comparison with the wishes of an entire nation? If architectural ruins are to be considered, Dalmatia may as well be Hungarian or Turk. If Italy pins her faith to monuments of stone, what of the Serbian Colony in her own Southern territory? Since the seventh century Dalmatia is in speech, custom and general character, a purely Serbian province. She has given birth to the oldest surviving Serbian literature as exemplified by the works of the poet Menchetitch. In the seventeenth century, the poet Ivan Gundulitch was illustrious among Serbian writers. Dalmatia has never forfeited its right to self-government. But where can it find national freedom except in union with its race brethren? Under Italian rule the Serbs of Dalmatia would fare worse than under Austro-Hungarian rule. Nationality can never be stifled, and through the centuries Dalmatia has awaited a national awakening. The heroic figures of the sculptor Mestrovitch reveal the suffering and hope of a people worthy to live in freedom, and to obtain at last that toward which it has tended so long: reunion with the rest of the race. . . . How can we, despised of our masters, view unmoved the glorious epopee of our brothers in Serbia, where a short space of Christian freedom sufficed to give a small State vigor and resolve to deliver Macedonia from the Turks? We, too, might have joined in the struggle and sacrifice, but we are forbidden to stretch our hands toward Serbia, our Mother. Nevertheless she remains our Mother, from whom we expect and shall obtain religious and every other freedom under the national flag.

The above question represents one party of the Southern Slav question. There is another, which deserves no less consideration. A strong Catholic element sees with misgiving the attraction of Dalmatians toward a land where Orthodoxy is the State creed, and where Catholicism has hitherto known neither grace nor favor. The group of patriotic Croats who find in allegiance to the Hapsburg dynasty not only a duty of conscience but the best safeguard for their faith have an earnest and respectable following among their countrymen. If less ardent and less ready to stake the future than the pronounced Serbophiles, they are determined to procure a better status for Dalmatia within the Austro-Hungarian Empire. They have succeeded in warding off the aggressive advance of Magyarism with its disintegrating concomitants of irreligion, and the corrupt morals due to Semitic ascendency in the Government of Budapest. They have held close to Austria as their natural guardian against the insidious encroachment of Italy and the violent agitation of Serbia. They fear, not without reason, that Serbian intolerance of Austria's State religion is so deep-rooted that Catholics of any nationality will still encounter it within the boundaries of free Serbia, the Concordat notwithstanding. They know that Russian influence was never so potent in the Balkans as it is to-day, and Russia's attitude toward the Church does not inspire confidence. Dalmatians, loyal to Austria and solicitous for the preservation of religious liberty as well as for national reforms, look to the formation of a triune empire instead of a dual empire for the realization of their independence.

It is well known that the late Archduke Francis Ferdinand, a staunch opponent of Hungarian pretensions, favored this notion of creating a new Southern Slav kingdom that would revive the traditions of Agram and Raguse. These sons of Dalmatia who refuse to separate her cause from that of the throne to which she has so long been an appendage, are troubled, but not shaken by the tempting offers of a triumphant Serbia. They will resist incorporation until it is forced on them; and should the stream of race unity prove too strong, they will enter the young kingdom as a humane, cultural element with the mission of pacification and reconciliation. There is at this moment in Valievo, a Serbian town devastated by the late Austrian invasion, a young Dalmatian priest who asked permission from the Serbian authorities to remain with the Austrian wounded and attend to their spiritual needs. Although twice laid prostrate by virulent attacks of febris recurrens he has endeared himself by his charitable activities to the entire population as well as to his immediate charge. Such men are new to Serbians, accustomed to suspect every figure in a cassock of political, imperialistic propagandism. The Concordat stipulates that the neophyte hierarchy of Serbia be drawn from non-Austrian nationalists, and this opens a field for ministrants of all other lands. While Dalmatia would, of course, retain its own clergy should it become united to Serbia, it is not likely that Dalmatian priests will be generally welcome in Serbia itself. The Swiss, Belgian, French or English clergy will have the preference, and this, let us hope, will have the effect of drawing wider attention to the needs and difficulties of the Church in Serbia. The best guarantee for the faithful fulfilment of every clause in the Concordat is the sympathetic interest of Catholics the world over in Serbian Catholicism, preserved and cherished through the vicissitudes of centuries by the staunch people of Dalmatia.

Help for Destitute Mexicans

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I take pleasure in submitting the following report of relief work done during the past two months among destitute Mexicans on both sides of the Rio Grande, with money and supplies furnished by Catholics in the United States. We have actual record of 755 people who have received food and clothing, in and around Brownsville. Supplies sufficient for an equal number have been sent to interior points in Mexico from which no report is possible at this time. The Charity Home in Brownsville, a private institution under the management of a Catholic lady, has been supplied with medicines and clothing for 120 inmates or pensioners. The Convent of the Incarnate Word, where some of the refugee nuns from Mexico are now sojourning, has been furnished with supplies. A sum of money has been forwarded by a reliable messenger to Montemoreles where other nuns are reported to be in need. A box of infants' clothing has been forwarded to El Paso where special work is being done for mothers and babes. One young man who was entirely helpless has had medical attention, and in consequence is now able to work and support his mother and three orphan children depending on him. Since it is no longer possible for us to carry our work into the interior, we are giving more attention to refugees in the United States. This presents a problem scarcely less momentous and difficult than the one on the other side of the Rio Grande.

I wish to call the attention of Catholic young men to the young Mexican exiles among us. There are thousands of them, intelligent for the most part, educated and high-minded. They have had nothing to do with the political embroilment of their country. In the main they come directly from schools and colleges where they were in course of training for useful trades or professions. They have all the young man's eagerness for life and all the idealism of the Latins. They are not running away from duty or danger. Their patriotism is of the kind that makes martyrs, and they are enduring martyrdom daily. Their loyalty to one another, their efforts to maintain themselves honorably, their courage and cheerfulness, testify to sterling manhood. Here and there they are organizing for mutual assistance. Those who can get work divide with those who can not and they accept any employment that is offered. I frequently have an hour's delightful conversation in the evening with a young man who can read the Greek classics in the original. During the day he drives a bony horse to a rickety express wagon, for which he receives the wage of one dollar per day, which he conscientiously contributes to the common fund. They laugh at their privations and by one means and another keep up their courage. They have regular meeting places, where they assemble to read and talk, and to find the comfort and strength of companionship. But such pitifully bleak and cheerless places these are! A few boxes serve as tables, some broken chairs, and a shelf of tattered books and magazines. Their chief efforts are directed toward studying English, a knowledge of which is the first step toward securing employment. The best-equipped study hall I have seen has a few benches without books, a homemade blackboard and a dozen books of assorted kinds to be circulated among about forty students.

As I go among them they are always eager to hear about American young men, their ideals, their ambitions, their pleasures, and their methods of self development. While I try to tell them what I know there rises before my mind in vivid contrast, visions of recreation rooms, libraries, gymnasiums and all the aids and inspirations whch are offered to the unfolding life of the American youth. I want the Catholic young men to take thought of these courageous young exiles, and out of their abundance send them help. I want money to buy books, and to furnish them with better facilities for helping themselves. They are undergoing the severest test that could be applied to them and they are measuring up to it like men. I have never heard a complaint, I have never seen anything except cheerful acceptance of their lot and gratitude for the asylum which is here afforded.

Considered from the point of numbers they constitute a large part of the numerical strength of the race. Considered from other standpoints they constitute the entire hope of the nation. But they have no official representatives to present their case before the tribunals of the world, they have no voice in the arbitration of affairs of great moment both to themselves and to their country. Nevertheless, some day they will go back home, and will become factors in the rebuilding of the nation. Let us give them something to take with them, something which will constitute a bond of brotherhood in the future.

Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of March 13 the vanquisher of "an athletic fellow of twenty-five" seems to have scored a knock-out in the very first round of his interesting encounter. Yet his tactics and his blows won him a personal rather than an objective victory. He impeached the faith of his opponent but did not solve the obvious difficulty confronting a young Catholic who feels the need of physical gymnastics. To charge him with disloyalty and to cast suspicion upon his faith because he avails himself of the only means at hand to meet his legitimate need is unwarranted and reprehensible and beyond the point at issue. In his first Encyclical Pope Benedict XV said:

> Again, let no private person, either by the publication of books or journals, or by delivering disclosures, publicly assume the position of a master in the Church. All know to whom God has given the teaching office in the Church; let him have the unrestricted right to speak as he thinks fitting when he wishes: it is the duty of others to tender him devout homage when he speaks and to obey his words. Concerning matters in which, since the Holy See has not pronounced judgment, saving faith and discipline, discussion may take place pro and contra, it is certainly lawful for everybody to say what he thinks and to uphold his opinion. But in such discussions let all intemperate language which may be seriously hurtful to charity be eschewed; let every one indeed maintain his own view freely, but let him do so modestly, and let him not imagine he is justified in casting suspicion on the faith or discipline of those who hold a contrary opinion simply because they differ from him.

We all know at whom the Pope's words were aimed and it is nowise stretching their import to apply them to the present controversy. Mr. Hume has presumed to pronounce sentence where the Church is silent. Such action is very much like setting oneself up as "a master in the Church." He brands as disloyal any and all Catholics who are affiliated in membership with the Y. M. C. A. The Holy See to whom is entrusted the guidance of the Church has issued no prohibition against such affiliation. Mr. McCloskey has a perfect right under the circumstances noted in his letter to avail himself of the privileges of his membership and Mr. Hume is expressly enjoined by the positive declaration of the Holy See from impeaching Mr. McCloskey's Catholicism or casting suspicion on his faith.

Mr. Hume's chief argument against an "athletic young fellow" is not any sounder than his unwarranted attack on the young man's loyalty. Stated universally it would read: "No Catholic can be loyal to his faith and retain his self respect who joins a voluntary organization or society from the higher offices of which Catholics are excluded." The proposition is not universally true nor does it accord with the historical toleration of the Church which, though always aiming primarily at the spiritual welfare of the faithful, does not curtail heedlessly their material opportunities. The application of the proposition to a civil society will establish its falsity. A Catholic native of the United States forswears his allegiance and becomes a naturalized British subject for the sole purpose of assuring better protection for his interests vested in foreign countries. His aim is purely material. The Catholic Church does not prohibit his change of citizenship. Yet by so doing he voluntarily affiliates himself with a civil society whose chief ruler and other high functionaries can not be Catholics. Moreover not only is his religion tabooed by statutory provision in the highest hereditary office and in various appointive positions, but a portion of the taxes which he is compelled to pay annually is employed directly for the sustenance and propagation of the State religion which is avowedly anti-Catholic. Such a naturalized British subject justly resents the charge that he is lacking in loyalty to his faith or in self respect. He would contend that his action was practically sound though admitting of theoretical objections.

Similarly the large Catholic membership of the Y. M. C. A. should be considered not only theoretically but practically. Its elimination will not be accomplished by sarcastic criticism and wholesale impeachment of the large number of Catholic young men of whom Mr. McCloskey is a representative. It is not my purpose to defend the Y. M. C. A. But its vast Catholic membership calls for fair and honest investigation. Its cause should be clearly determined. The question is not whether a loyal Catholic can be an associate member, but rather why are there so many loyal Catholics enrolled in the Y. M. C. A.? It must exert a strong appeal to produce so large a response. There must be a real need for some such organization. Otherwise it would not prevail over parental objection and the maturer applicant's own reluctance. The challenging tone and the rashness of Mr. McCloskey's letter furnish more than a ready handle for severe arraignment and sharp retort. They indicate a deep conviction of the justice and rectitude of his position. No true solution of the young man's difficulty, no fair response to his challenge will overlook the causes of his confidence. He is evidently in the dilemma of foregoing his accustomed exercise or retaining his membership. He has thousands of coreligionists with him in the same or in a similar predicament. It is to his credit and not reproach that he regrets the failure to make provision for himself and others in the Catholic scheme of social and fraternal organization. He represents a very real and a very earnest type of the young Catholic who has imbibed some of the principles of the so-called modern progress. Cleanliness, physical exercise and health are the chief slogans of the new order which tends to overemphasize their importance and relegate the virtues of the spirit to the background. The views of the apostles of the health gospel may be exaggerated, but athletics and gymnastics are not to be wholly pooh-poohed. They have a recognized place in the curriculum of our schools, colleges and universities; and experience teaches that besides the positive moral and physical advantages accruing from their use they have a wide negative effect that consists in engrossing the interest and dissipating the purely physical energies of boys and young men.

With the almost universal application of machinery, and the congestion of large populations in the cities, great numbers of men have been transferred from the farm to the factory and counting-room. To preserve their health there is urgent need of a substitute for the open-air physical labors that brought their ancestors home at night, wearied in limb and muscle after a long day's toil.

Mr. McCloskey and his fellows are the victims of a changed economic order. They are not disloyal Catholics. They are sufferers because of some one's neglect, lack of foresight or indifference. Nevertheless Mr. McCloskey has done a real service toward the solution of the problem by openly avowing the reasons for his membership in the Y. M. C. A. He has made himself a target for severe criticism. But no attack leveled at him can fail to penetrate into the real causes of his predicament. No fair-minded man can hear the faith of a Catholic member of the Y. M. C. A. called into question without adverting to the folly of ignoring the needs and demands of athletic young men, and praying God to speed the day when those demands will be met.

Meanwhile let no one hurl his private anathemas at our Catholic youth who venture, often reluctantly, into the precincts of the Y. M. C. A. The Holy See, which is the divinely appointed custodian of the faith of old and young, has not forbidden their entrance. In that wise spirit of toleration which recognizes the difficulties confronting her members the Church permits membership in associations like the Y. M. C. A., provided there is no proximate danger to faith or morals. The Church in her wisdom has not been convinced that such danger exists, and she denies emphatically to any private Catholic the right to impeach the faith or discipline of those of her members who avail themselves of her tacit permission to join the Y. M. C. A. In keeping with her spirit and her express command the opponents of the Y. M. C. A. should confine themselves to criticism of that organization, and refrain from abusing or questioning the faith and loyalty of its Catholic members.

Baltimore. J. A. FARRELL.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of March 13 there is a letter from Leo Paul McCloskey under the title "Catholics in Y. M. C. A." His enunciation of the principal arguments urged against Catholics joining the Y. M. C. A. omits one of grave importance, namely, frequenting an occasion of danger. I would suggest that no one should count on his ability to resist attempts upon his faith. Overconfidence in our own strength often makes us a victim of our opponent's sword. It is idle to think that God's graces are nearer to one in the swimming pool of a Y. M. C. A. than in the teaching of Holy Mother Church, and in the associations fostered and encouraged by her ministers. Far better is it to take one's soul before God all lustrous, albeit the modest family tub furnish the only medium for aquatic exercise, than to go to judgment worn and wounded by a life-long resistance to the proselyting influence of the Y. M. C. A. A splendidly developed physique is but a poor compensation for the sacrifice.

I take it that our friend is not in sympathy either with the A. O. H. or the K. of C. of his home town. Can it be presumed, that, while he has been blessed with the faculty of observation to such extent as to discover the discrepancies between what these two great Catholic societies have accomplished and what they should accomplish, he does not realize the opportunity thus presented to brain and brawn? Doesn't he see an opportunity to become "the man of the hour"? If he has not, so far, identified himself with either, or both, of these admirable organizations, should he not now do so, and bend his mental and physical efforts toward bringing to pass those things which will draw his Catholic brothers, and all men, toward a happy eternity and in the meantime give them the best that this temporal life can afford?

Yea, my friend Leo, now that you have discovered a condition that needs the injection of brain and brawn, sit not idly by and complain. It has been given to you to uncover a lamentable state of affairs. Yours also is the complemental duty of making an effort to interest Catholic men in your proposal. Knowing the A. O. H. and K. of C. as I know them, I am sure that if you can prove to them the advantages of the plan you advocate, you will find a fertile field for effort.

The Physician's Angel

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The announcement of a retreat for physicians at St. Vincent's hospital, New York City, recalls the fact that St. Raphael is the patron of physicians, surgeons and nurses. Was there ever a time in human history when his assistance was more needed than to-day? Yet he is not known, he is not invoked by our Catholic medical corps as he should be. Some years ago, the writer's attention was called to this subject by a medical man who was highly successful in his profession. In his consulting rooms, that time-honored piece of furniture for a physician, the bust of Æsculapius, had no place. Instead, there was a statue of St. Raphael, before which burned a perpetual taper. Of course it provoked comment and observation. No man lets his light shine, without the world being aware of it; but so much the better. Observation brings inquiry, and inquiry brings knowledge, and knowledge brings wisdom. I, myself, was of those to ask, and to learn. It appeared that a certain French vicar-general of Clermont, the Abbé Chardon, had left us a book too little known, entitled "The Memoirs of a Seraph." We are there told that St. Raphael signifies in Hebrew "Physician of God—healing of God." (St. Gregory. Hom. 34):

> It is he that makes known to men so many and simple remedies. Many others would be revealed to physicians and men of science if, less puffed up with pride, they would condescend to have recourse to them with humility. Happy among men is the physician of intelligence and faith who will appreciate the aid placed at his disposal by the physician of God. He will show himself grateful. He will reserve a place of honor in his dwelling for a statue of Raphael. Morning and evening he will salute the heavenly patron of his science. Nor will he begin his studies, or go to visit the sick without glancing toward him and invoking him: Come to my aid, O Spirit, Friend of man! By communicating thy wonderful secrets enlighten my ignorance; give wisdom to my determinations; give steadiness to my incertitude; prevent mistakes; second my care; work the cure. May all my art through thee become charity; and may every consolation procured for the poor sick make them praise God.

Is not this the perfect prayer of humility and faith for our physicians, surgeons and nurses? Æsculapius is a memory, a shade. St. Raphael is a hope, a living power. The materialistic man of science would reverse these facts. Having, perhaps, no more superstition than faith, he would call upon the memory of the dead to aid him. The memory of Æsculapius is, he implies, by the bust in his consulting rooms, an inspiration to trust in his own powers. Vain confidence. Usually, his bust is dusty, and more or less soiled. No votive lamp illuminates its dumb outlines; no importunate prayer invokes that assistance.

The Abbé Chardon does not refrain from condemning the Catholic physician, surgeon or nurse who neglects to obtain the cooperation of so powerful a friend. Could any act be more reasonable and simple on the part of a Christian who believes in the efficacy of prayer? We are not of those who declare that science is belittled or retarded by Christian faith, because we are eye-witnesses of the contrary effects, having all our lives lived under a roof where science is pursued. Once when a Pure Food and Drug Law was to be sought from a State unfriendly to it, a man of science, unaccustomed to such public speaking, appeared before the House of Representatives. Without oratory, or gesture, to assist him, without lobbying or obvious "supporters," he stated, in plain language, the scientific importance of this law. At the close of his brief address, there was not one vote opposed to his proposition. He had prayed before the Blessed Sacrament that this might be so, before he took an early train to the Capitol.

"Here lies Pasteur," we read above a mausoleum which is an altar in Paris. This statement is simple, and would stand alone; but it may be expanded into the history of a life of scientific labor that has thus far no equal in the world. Louis Pasteur looms unabashed the Christian man of science par excellence in the records of such achievements. He has standardized that field as men of business now talk of "standardizing" their trades. Nor is it the Church alone that thus proclaims him. The State, that elusive, tyrannical, exacting entity, for once agrees with the Church in this decision. By unanimous consent, this man of God, this friend of the suffering body, is humanly speaking, one of the Immortals. Shall the modern physician, surgeon or nurse hesitate to follow in his steps of faith?

Is it not to the eternal glory of the Church that she permits no chloroform or ether to be administered until after the Sacraments have been received? One may witness these things any day in a Catholic hospital. In their linen over-slips and white-winged cornettes, the assisting nurses stand near the operating table, with hands meekly folded, in silent prayer. The surgeon, cone in hand, bows his head. The patient, having previously received the Sacraments of the Church, St. Raphael is invoked. But a moment, and the sign to proceed is made. Usually the patient wakes, in an hour or two, to convalescence. If not, a Christian soul has gone forth, not alone, afraid and helpless, but conducted by St. Raphael to a life and a country eternal and full of glory. May St. Raphael attract and enlighten our physicians, surgeons and nurses, not only on the battlefields of Europe to-day, but in our cities and homes of the peaceful world.

The "Outlook's" Suggestions

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Discussing the measures recently proposed in Congress to authorize exclusion of scurrilous and libelous publications from the mails the Outlook says:

> If the Roman Catholic Church finds itself assailed by scurrilous and libelous publications, as we think is the case, it should pursue the course which other persons pursue when they are similarly assailed. It should either bring a suit for libel against the publisher, or it should take measures to have the publishers criminally indicted by a grand jury and punished under the general law. That this is not an unpracticable remedy in a free State is very clearly brought out by one witness before the Congressional Committee to which these bills for the establishment of a censorship of the press have been referred. Cardinal Newman was brought up in England for trial for defaming Father Achilli who had left the Roman Catholic Church for the Protestant communion as Cardinal Newman had left the Protestant Church for the Roman Catholic communion. He was convicted of a libel and was mulcted to the extent of 12,000 English pounds or $60,000. The Outlook quite agrees with Dr. G. F. Williams who stated these facts to the committee that they show that the existing laws are quite sufficient to protect the Roman Catholic Church and its priests and clergy from any scurrilous and libelous attacks which may be made against them by unscrupulous partisan journals.

The "Catholic Encyclopedia" (Vol. X, p. 797) thus gives the real facts of the Newman-Achilli trial.

> An apostate Italian priest, Achilli, was haranguing against the Church. Prompted by Wiseman, the Oratorian gave particulars of this man's infamous career, and Achilli brought a charge of libel. Newman at enormous expense, collected evidence which fully justified the accusations he had made. But a no-popery jury convicted him. He was fined £100; on appeal, the verdict was quashed; and the Times admitted that a miscarriage of justice had taken place when Newman was declared guilty.

Now, applying these facts—which are facts—to the case of one of the human polecats of the Menace or of any other of the publications which the Outlook so sternly calls "unscrupulous partisan journals," we see that all a libeled priest has to do is to publish the facts about the polecat, get sued for libel, spend some thousands of dollars in preparing the case, be convicted, have his conviction quashed on appeal and then secure a triumphant vindication, with a possible chance that the Outlook may finally admit that his original conviction was not wholly justified, and that the polecat was an "unscrupulous partisan." What more could any one want? In the light of the real facts of the Newman-Achilli trial as told by Doctor William Barry in the "Catholic Encyclopedia," it is worth while studying the version contributed by Dr. G. F. Williams, with which the Outlook "quite agrees" as quoted above. Bad scholarship and bad logic are, it is true, almost invariably found in company with the "strictly Protestant" point of view and the reason is not far to seek. But one can not help wondering who it is that cooks up the extraordinary travesties of fact which one runs across from time to time and of which this Outlook-Dr. Williams' instance is a good sample. Where is this kind of history made? Can it be in some of the "universities" which turn out those innumerable "D.D.'s" who are so plentiful in the land in these days?

"America" in Catholic Colleges

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Many schemes have been proposed to spread the influence of the Catholic press, but it seems to me that AMERICA itself in its present campaign to get the National Catholic Weekly into every Catholic college and high school, has proposed the most feasible of all. That young men in college and high school read AMERICA and enjoy it is a proof of the readableness of the paper. Here in Holy Cross College over three hundred boys are following each week's contents with the greatest interest. A large number of the boys at Brooklyn College, New York, are also reading your Review every week. This custom was introduced into these two colleges by teachers who had in view the present improvement of the boys, and who were desirous also of introducing them early to the discussion of problems that fall within the province of lay activity. Into the ranks of the active laymen we want our boys to enter from the very start.

The task of getting boys at Holy Cross interested in AMERICA has not been difficult. In the first place the active work of selling the copies to the students was entrusted to two popular seniors. Then the professors spoke of the publication in the classroom in a casual way, and in some cases assigned theme work and the drafting of speeches from topics handled in the current issue of the Review. These several methods, coupled with an active appreciation of the paper by the professors themselves, who often spoke in their classes regarding timely and important articles in the week's issue, made a strong impression on the student mind. It is our earnest hope that once the student has become familiar with the paper, he will always feel its need, and desire long acquaintance with the best in Catholic journalism.

With the new campaign to get all Catholic students in our Catholic schools and colleges throughout the country reading AMERICA, it would seem that all Catholic teachers should be in sympathy. It is not hard to awaken interest. The price is no longer prohibitive, as almost every boy can find five cents a week for his copy if he cares to do so. We teachers must show the way and make it our aim to lead the boy to such a desire. For the most part boys are not unwilling to take an interest in questions of the day. All they need is a little instruction on the obligation incumbent on every educated Catholic of keeping informed on topics that are engaging public attention, especially in the bearing on Catholic interests. They soon find that the task is not so dry as at first appeared. May we soon hear that other Catholic colleges in the country are doing what Holy Cross is doing for the Catholic press, namely, disposing weekly of more than one hundred copies of AMERICA to the students!

The Metamorphosed Russian

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Readers of AMERICA who have followed affairs in the Near East with more than casual interest must have regarded with surprise, and even bewilderment, the pen-picture of "The Russian Soldier" which appeared in its pages a few weeks ago. The paper besides being well written and readable was evidently based on intimate, first-hand knowledge, not only of the Tsar's fighting-machine but also of the stock from which it is recruited—the Russian peasant. It was precisely this quality of genuineness and actuality in the essay of E. Christich that occasioned deep perplexity in some quarters.

Obviously the article was intended to be an unqualified eulogy of the Russian soldier, the Russian peasant, and of the Russian character in general. The peasant of the Empire is depicted as being a spiritual, devout, supernatural, frugal, ascetic, charitable, compassionate, humble, obedient and docile agrarian idealist. A combination of virtues that would render him a rare ornament in any community, Slavic or Teutonic. But if he is this compound of amiability he is assuredly worthy of far better treatment than is generally accorded him by the scholars, travelers and ethnologists who have studied him on his native heath and then recorded their findings in the pages of contemporaneous history. Their reports run altogether counter to the glowing description of his latest very able apologist. Thus, for example, E. Christich says in "The Russian Soldier":

> The bulk of the Russian army is made up of peasants, and therefore it is a religious, loyal, docile, devout, humane body of men, for all these qualities distinguish the Russian peasant. The mainspring of his life is a supernatural force. . . . Frugal, ascetic, charitable, devout, the Mujik is very close to the Christian ideal. No other Christian race has so spontaneously assimilated the Christian teaching of poverty, humility and renunciation.

Yet the "Catholic Encyclopedia," to which "E. C." is a contributor, says, vol. XIII, p. 233, sq.:

> Statistics show a continual increase of criminality in Russia, due to the increase of population, the dissemination of socialistic and revolutionary ideas among the lower classes, the want of culture and the lack of moral influence of the Orthodox religion. [Here follows a long list of statistics.] The highest percentage of criminals is furnished by the peasants. . . . Political criminality has increased there to an alarming degree. . . . The seminaries both morally and intellectually are in a wretched condition; from these seminaries the moral and intellectual shortcomings of the Russian clergy are derived, their students as a rule entering the priesthood without the least vocation. . . . This clergy exercises its ministry over more than ninety millions of Orthodox faithful; but it is rendered incapable of accomplishing its mission by poverty, want of education, the lack of sound vocations, the oppression of the Government, contempt and social isolation, family cares, and not infrequently by drink. Only in the cities are there to be found priests of culture and in comfortable circumstances; those who work in the rural parishes are deserving of pity and compassion.

The conclusion from all this is patent. The whole history of religious experience demonstrates that if the shepherds be such, it is morally impossible for the sheep to be "religious, devout, ascetic," with "the mainspring of his life a supernatural force"!

However much he may wish to believe the best about his fellow-men, the lover of truth will be hard put to it to reconcile these and certain other discrepancies that rear themselves like a barbed wire entanglement between the historical Russian and the mystical, dreaming idealist that graced AMERICA's pages a while ago. Paradox peeps o'er paradox and inconsistencies on inconsistencies arise. And strangest of all is the puzzle furnished by a comparison between previous articles of E. Christich and this latest appreciation of Ivan. For example, within less than a twelvemonth, March 14, 1914, there appeared in AMERICA an essay entitled "The Russian Advance" by the author of "The Russian Soldier." This particular subject had at the time an especial interest for the present writer, as he was then less than a day's journey from the Russian frontier. The paper was, in substance, a sharp cry of warning from "E C." to the nations of Europe against the "Russian peril" which "like an octopus" is creeping relentlessly forward, threatening before long to lay the whole English-speaking world prostrate under its domination! England in particular is warned of the peril; her "supine indifference" in the face of the steady stream of Russian emigration through Turkestan, with Russia all the while "surreptitiously" increasing her army, is scornfully characterized by "E. C." as downright cowardice In fine, the whole tenor, intent and atmosphere of this contribution is the flat negation of all that "The Russian Soldier" stands for! A single example must suffice, though they might be multiplied.

In "The Russian Soldier," speaking of Russia's limited army, and the total absence of militarism, "E. C." says:

"Another cause for the limitation is the non-martial character of the people, the most restful, inaggressive people in the world." In "The Russian Advance" we read:

> No more striking change in the trend of international politics has taken place within the last decade than the tacit acceptance of Russian expansion, etc. . . . Turn whither we will the spectacle of Russia creeping forward confronts us, materially in Asia, politically in Europe. . . . Friends of liberty and tolerance the world over will hope that it (the absorption of smaller States like Persia) be deferred until the great Muscovite Empire has reached a higher grade in her cultural evolution. . . . Russia is creating a sphere of influence in Hungary itself, and from Alaska to Suedo-Finnish ground, from the Urals to the Baltic, she stretches like an octopus. (AMERICA, vol. X, p. 540.)

And yet with this warning ringing in our ears that the Russian bear "is overwhelming the world," we are invited to remember that this race is "the most restful, inaggressive people in the world"!

But still one's wonder grows, for in AMERICA for May 10, and 17, 1913, appears another, longer contribution from the pen of E. Christich. These two papers entitled, "The Rule of the Romanoffs" were inspired by the jubilee of the Romanoff dynasty in 1913, its tercentenary. They are anything but complimentary either to the Romanoffs or to their ideals, which have of necessity become the dominating factor in Russian life. Put side by side with "The Russian Soldier" these documents add to our perplexity. For example we read in "The Russian Soldier":

> The Russian soldier's greatcoat is spacious, for he likes plenty of room and full freedom of movement. Neither is his soul stunted by cast-iron rules, meticulous observances of non-essential details or the systematic harshness that drives to suicide. Between officer and man there is human dealing, mutual tolerance and the sense of solidarity that actuates all Slavs without regard to caste. . . . Everything in Russia is big, etc., etc. . . .

In "The Rule of the Romanoffs" we read: "Romanoff liberty is an article for export only. . . . In Russia the preachers of liberalism find their way to Siberia, and religious freedom is a fiction." These last statements are, of course, absolutely unimpeachable, as the writer then goes on to show by specific references to the insidious and systematic persecution of the Catholic Church which has not relaxed for three hundred years. There are thirteen million Catholics in Russia, we might remark in passing, despite the fact that a Catholic priest is punished by being driven into exile if he dares to admit a convert to the Sacraments.

Finally, not to multiply the puzzling parodoxes, "E. C." says, in "The Russian Soldier":

> He depends on moral and not on material help to attain his end. Because he possesses his soul, the Russian soldier knows no defeat. . . . At a massed parade on Morsova Polya, outside Petrograd, I saw a body of stolid-looking recruits break their lines and rush toward the Tsar as soon as he appeared, hurrahing and waving their caps in a manner certainly not learned at drill. . . . They had only just come from their villages and could not control their excitement at finding themselves in proximity to the person of the Tsar.

Obviously the purpose of this is to prove that the Russian soldier "possessing his soul" is not a military automaton, but, that man for man he stands, fellow even with the Tsar in "that solidarity that actuates all Slavs without regard to caste." Yet, the same writer, in "The Rule of the Romanoffs" defends a thesis which is absolutely the contrary:

> Nothing is plainer, nevertheless, than that the Tsar is never considered on an equality with the rest of humanity. His vaunted familiarity with the poorest Mujik may be gauged from the following verbatim translation of the peasants' address in the recent jubilee celebrations.

"E. C." then quotes the address to prove that Russian "equality" is a myth. One could hardly have found a better confirmation of a pet theory, for the document is a piteous specimen of that absolute servility of spirit which furnishes the groundwork of a despotism. The poor peasants who spoke such lines, i e.—potential Russian soldiers—plainly possessed neither body nor soul of their own. They are but units in relentless autocracy, mere ciphers in a horde.

Small wonder, then, that we are bewildered in this maze of contradiction. Surely, objective truth remains ever the same, one and indivisible. But perhaps it is the subjective viewpoint that has veered to meet the exigencies of—war? Whom are we to believe, E. Christich or E. Christich?

Gothic Vestments

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I read with pleasure the letter published in your issue of February 27 in reference to the so-called "Gothic" vestments, and I hope our Catholic clergy will bring them into use again. In what Pugin called the "Ages of Faith" they were, I believe generally, if not universally, in use, and have been used in quite recent years; here in Philadelphia there is a church that had a set, which the pastor told me was kept for the greater festivals. But besides their superior beauty as compared with the stiff vestments now commonly used, they also symbolize Our Lord hanging on the Cross, for the "Gothic" chasuble has the transverse bars, placed not at a right angle, but at an angle of about 45 degrees with the upright, thus symbolizing the position of the arms of Our Lord as He hung upon the Cross. One has only to look at any crucifix and this will then be apparent. The Cross is represented in this way not only on the back of the chasuble, but also on the front, and will call to mind what the author of the "Imitation of Christ" says about a priest vested for Mass and going to the altar: that he bears the Cross of Christ on his breast and also on his back.

Boston and a Bargain

THE plain man might well inquire what it was that drew together at Boston—as jarring discords resolve in a harmonious concord—such divergent elements as two bishops of the Episcopal Church, a bishop of the Methodist Church, the "unknown presbyter" of Boston, Rose Kelly, upon whom the Catholics "practised electricity," and Dorothy Nichols, sometime inmate of the House of the Good Shepherd. The answer is that Rome brought them together; or, to be more explicit, a common antagonism to Catholics made them forget for the time being the many causes of disunion that divide them. In a world of uncertainty there is considerable comfort in knowing that whatever else may be doubtful, Rome is always wrong. Hence the Protestant divines and Rose Kelly and Dorothy Nichols, somtime inmate of the House of the Good Shepherd.

It is extremely probable that Miss Kelly's acquaintance with electricity is as slight as her acquaintance with Jesuits, whom she conceives as a species of underground clergymen, devoting their lives to producing shocks. On such a count her testimony, so far as it regards the amendment "respecting an establishment of religion," may be taken as passing. But Bishops Lawrence and Babcock, and the Rev. W. H. Van Allen, as members of a Church that is in communion with the English Protestant Reformed Religion as by Law Established, know with all certainty that nothing is more remote and far from probability than that the Catholic Church is ever likely to become the established religion of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, or of the United States. Yet an absurd clause to this effect finds a place in the amendments proposed to prohibit appropriations for "sectarian" purposes.

Having begun with universals, it was a simple matter for the proponents to descend to particulars. Hence, under the generalship of Mrs. Susan E. Stevens, a lady of the place, an attack was made upon Catholic institutions in general, and the Houses of the Good Shepherd in particular. We have no brief to apologize for the Houses of the Good Shepherd, they need no apology. It is established beyond dispute, both in England and in America, among Catholics and Anglicans, that the only rescue work of any lasting value is that carried on by religious. If, out of the vast number of inmates of such homes in this country, Mrs. Stevens should have found two to back up her hysterical charges, her contentions are simply disproved by pointing to the considerable majority who do not testify for her. "Hell-holes" was the name the lady gave, with an alliterative turn, to the Houses of the Good Shepherd, which, after all, is true in a sense. For they may be likened to holes to which many a fallen woman creeps from the pit of hell, down which she was slipping rapidly, into the sunshine of forgiveness and grace radiating from the lives of those who have taken for their pattern the Good Shepherd Who gave His life for the sheep. The riches of the world could not purchase for one hour one such consecrated life; but if an appropriation of the Massachusetts State funds helps to lift the burden ever so lightly, no blame will attach to the two Protestant bishops, the "unknown presbyter" of Boston, Rose Kelly and Dorothy Nichols, the sometime inmate of the House of the Good Shepherd. A goodly company this. It should be incorporated for the protection of morals, especially truth, chastity and the prevention of the practice of electricity. Apparently the Right Reverend Fathers in the Lord could withstand all shocks administered by their experienced associates, Rose Kelly and Dorothy Nichols, sometime inmate of the House of the Good Shepherd, and Pilate and Herod would be reconciled once again.

Brother Anthony

IN the death of Brother Anthony, New York has lost a friend and benefactor. For more than a quarter of a century he gave the best of his varied and cultivated powers to the higher education of her children. He was not content to give money to the betterment of our city, but he gave, what is far more precious, both the golden and the silver years of his life. As long ago as 1870 he was occupying the chair of English literature in Manhattan College, and from that time on until the day of his death, with some few interruptions when superiorships engaged him elsewhere, he continued to preside over the various institutions of higher learning which are conducted by the Christian Brothers in New York City. How profoundly he influenced Catholic life may still be seen in the very evident marks of his training left on many of the city's most loyal and most fervent Catholic homes. It was inevitable that he should have done so, for he was a Christian gentleman of the old type, kindly, courteous, courtly and courageous. His learning, his self-control, his high ideals were an inspiration to many hundreds of young men. Nor have they ceased with his death. They have been perpetuated in countless instances, where those who came under his influence felt themselves moved to make their lives noble with a strong, fearless, uncompromisingly loyal Catholic manhood such as his. Careers like his are all too rare; their memory should be kept alive.

"Non-Sectarian Ethics"

THE November-December Bulletin of the High School Teachers' Association, New York City, may be said to have been made in Germany; and to that extent it was made well. One article explains the selection of reading texts in German secondary schools, which is determined primarily by their moral worth and character-making power, and only secondarily by their literary value; another fills half the issue with an account of the vocational and continuation schools of Munich, the best type of the system of secondary education that obtains throughout the German empire. Henry E. Fritz, Ph.D., was one of twenty-five American teachers who went to Germany to study its school system, and this article is the result of his observations. Having sketched with keen appreciation the practical purpose and methods and masterly efficiency of the German vocational schools and their skilful application of academic subjects to the training of serviceable and patriotic citizens, the professor describes one evening's class-work in detail. An hour each is given to shop theory and mathematics, to history and civics and the science of machinery, and to German literature. So far our American teacher is in enthusiastic accord, but then follows one hour on "Religion," and here he balks. Protestants and Jews were transferred to sections where their respective religions were taught, a procedure which might, but does not, excite the American's admiration. Electing to remain with the Catholics, he hears the students explain the meaning of Faith, the Christian, Mosaic and natural laws, the Godhead of Christ and the powers He gave His Church, the three parts of the Mass, and a section of Church history—certainly a full and profitable hour; but he is not satisfied. "What a fine opportunity," he laments, "was here, after the practical lesson on veneers, to teach non-sectarian ethics in relation to veneers!"

But despite the lost opportunity their educational system, rigidly sectarian though it be, has, he insists, made the German people "happy, contented with little, industrious, honest, thrifty, yet wealthy," while "unemployment and poverty had almost disappeared." Surely, then, they could dispense with "non-sectarian ethics"; yet the perverse conclusion our American brings back with him is: "We must sooner or later introduce non-sectarian ethics into all the schools of the United States to counteract the tendency toward lawlessness of which American teachers complain." But why not introduce that which has proved its ability to counteract this tendency rather than an undefined something which never did? He would have the teacher expound "the wickedness of selling veneers for solid wood." But suppose the student asks why this is wicked? He will find an adequate answer only in the laws of God, natural and revealed; which will at once whisk him out of the shadowy land of "unsectarian ethics" into Church and Bible and positive Christianity.

The Munich student was there already. He had learned in the hour of "Religion" the wickedness of false veneers, and the source and limits of all other wickedness, and its penalties, and the sanctions and rewards of righteousness. The German Government had taken care of that. The December Studies thus summarizes the system:

> In every school the Imperialized curriculum has provided for every scholar a definite and denominational plan of religious instruction extending over the whole nine years; an integral part of the official course, taught at the expense of the State by trained teachers, Catholic, or Lutheran, or Calvinist, or Hebrew, as each scholar required; amply provided for in point of time; the leading subject in the official time-table; not a separate branch, nor unofficial annex, but in the express words of the Prussian State Code, "an essential part of the general organization of the school, not holding a separate or isolated position, but closely bound up in active correlation with all branches of the school work which aim at culture and education."

The secondary teacher passes an examination in philosophy and pedagogy, languages and literature, religious knowledge and "general professional fitness." Religion, then, positive and denominational, is an essential part of the system which our American visiting teachers have found so efficient in Germany. This, and not the vague and foundationless ethics that we have already tried and found wanting, is what will counteract lawlessness and build up a God-fearing and law-respecting people. The religious knowledge prescribed would also greatly benefit the teachers.

Save Me from My Friends

IT is a curious, though common phenomenon, that people who have spent their energies in attacking the Catholic Church and its principles, and feign to regard it as dead, or moribund, or at any rate negligible as a world force, will suddenly wake up and complain that it does not exert the very power whose existence they had been denying. Abandoning the faith and teaching of his youth, M. Maeterlinck has glorified the intelligence of birds and horses, and immortalized unintelligent sentient beings at the expense of the immortality of the human soul as expounded by the Catholic Church. Thereby he won socialistic, materialistic, anti-Catholic, anti-Christian plaudits, and not a little cash profit, but forfeited the support of the statesmen, priests and people who, for the last thirty years, the period of his propaganda, have upbuilt the Belgian Government and nation. As a Government and a people Belgium has stood boldly and effectively for the very things that Maeterlinck repudiated, and thereby it has attained preeminence industrially, socially, religiously, educationally and morally among self-governing nations. During all that period it stood, and still stands, unflinchingly by the Catholic Church and its Head; and now this apostate Fleming, who writes French plays, has the impudence to denounce the Pope for not exerting the authority of which he had always denied him the possession. The report of his tirade is as follows:

ROME, March 15.—Maurice Maeterlinck, the Belgian author, who is attempting to stir up a pro-Ally sentiment by lectures throughout Italy, to-day made a savage attack on the Vatican for maintaining a neutral attitude in the war. He declared that the Holy See in taking this position has abandoned the teachings of Jesus Christ.

The silly charge is proved false by a better Belgian authority than Maeterlinck. Mgr. de Wachter, Bishop Auxiliary to Cardinal Mercier, has written:

His Holiness, Pope Benedict XV, has expressed his entire satisfaction as well as his paternal sympathy with our great Cardinal Archbishop of Malines. The powers of evil would like to make mischief between Catholic Belgium and the Holy See, but they will not succeed. Later on irresistible proof of the Sovereign Pontiff's profound and complete sympathy with our unhappy country and its courageous and eminent prelate will be made public.

Later it will also appear that the anti-Christian propaganda of M. Maeterlinck and his friends have quite other objects in view than the interests of Belgium or of Italy, and that the Pope, in acting impartially as the loving father of all nations and peoples, has wisely safeguarded the interests of both. Maeterlinck's attacks are reported to have angered many Italian friends of the Allies. The form of the propaganda assumed by him and his anti-Christian confrères might well elicit the cry: "Save me from my friends!"

"Pseudochromesthesia"

SOUNDS like a dreadful malady, but according to Dr. Coriat it is not so alarming as it seems. The word is merely the short name for the disease—or should we not say the gift?—of hearing colors. He had a woman patient, reports the Boston Transcript, to whom the name "Nellie," for instance, suggested pale blue: "Lucy" a clear sapphire, "Bertha" a deep Prussian blue. Long a she described as a "cool" sound; long e a "high, cool sound"; purple depressed her, and green produced a feeling of discontent. This remarkable woman could also "taste" beautiful colors, and she had a fellow-patient in whom "Each type of pain produced its individual and invariable color, for instance: hollow pain, blue color; sore pain, red color; deep headache, vivid scarlet; superficial headache, white color."

Dr. Coriat's discoveries will doubtless prove, if the term may be permitted, "epoch-making." The use of a word like "loud" to describe flamboyant attire, "dark-brown" to express an unpleasant taste, and "blue" to indicate lowness of spirits, has hitherto been thought highly figurative language that refined lovers of "understatement" always avoid. But now the use of such terms can be defended on scientific grounds, and there will develop a race of expert "chromesthesiasts" who will be able to express with the colors of the spectrum every sound the human ear can catch, every taste the palate can enjoy, and every emotion that stirs the heart. A trumpet-blast, for example, will doubtless be a vivid red, a chanted dirge a deep violet, a pleasant "Good Morning" a delicate green. The taste of onions, too, might well be described with a sort of Niobitic yellow; that of terrapin with brilliant blue; and Boston beans with a not-too-sober gray. The anxiety insistent creditors cause a merchant would probably be a mauve tint which could readily be distinguished from the lilac hue with which a greedy boy's repentance is feelingly expressed. But no one but a highly-skilled chromesthesiast could tell just how the sigh of a love-lorn swain differed in color from that of a briefless barrister, or discern the scarlet elation of a successful office-seeker from the cherry-colored blitheness of a rising author. The science of chromesthesia has, unquestionably, a bright future.

Open Advocacy of Sin

THE gradual but steady reversion of our civilization to the ideals and practices of paganism is making it increasingly difficult for Catholics to maintain a firm hold on Christian principles. Christ's code of morals, though not by that name, is being branded as superstition. Advocates of the new ethics are waxing stronger and bolder, and doctrines which a score of years ago were whispered in secret, are now shouted from the housetops. Practices which are clearly in violation of one of the most obvious mandates of the natural law, and which, moreover, have been forbidden by unmistakable and direct revelations of the divine will, are now unblushingly advised as the dictates of the "clean good sense of mankind." The prohibition of the detestable deeds, similar in effect at least to Onan's, is lightly called a "hideous doctrine." We quote from the New Republic, in the issue of March 6:

The time is at hand when men and women must denounce it as a conspiracy against the race, when public opinion must compel the amendment of laws which make it a criminal offence to teach people how to control their fertility. Harmless methods of preventing conception are known. . . . But what so many of the well-to-do and the educated practice, the poor are prevented from learning. . . . They pay for it . . . by the production of a horde of unwanted souls. . . . There is not one of these miseries which can not be largely reduced by the extension to all classes of inventions already the property of the educated. What are the objections to the use of a knowledge which is defended by so few and practised by so many? The root of them is the tendency to shudder at anything which seems to interfere with God's plan. . . . But the clean, good sense of mankind is through with that black inversion.

All this is abominable. It is teaching and pleading the cause of mortal sin. And its danger is the greater by reason of its insidious plea for the happiness of mankind. Such writers, knowing no better, are seemingly sincere. Taking their stand on the purely natural, and starting from the principle that the diminution of temporal infelicity is the greatest good, they look on the rights of man as supreme, disregard entirely the rights of God, and leave altogether out of account the supernatural. It is to be regretted that any paper should make itself the spokesman of a reactionary and immoral doctrine that is a menace both to the individual and society. The Catholic attitude is expressed in the words of an indignant subscriber, published in a subsequent number of the New Republic, who declares the article in question to be "deserving of rebuke beyond the power of words to express. The doctrine there taught is not only flagrant immorality, but criminal, and there should be laws enacted to punish as criminals the sowing of such tares. The article evinces hopeless immorality. . . . I can not have a paper that would publish such filth come into my house. Please remove my name from your list." With this criticism all Catholics will be in sympathy. Such writing pollutes the atmosphere of the home.

The Hope of the World

ALMIGHTY prayer for peace has been lifted up to the Sacred Heart by the nations far removed from the war-stricken countries of Europe. Once more divine charity has overflowed upon the earth from the fountain of love, that "love alone might reign among men." What response the charity of God will find in the hearts of His creatures we can not tell. What still remains to be drained of that cup of bitterness which the folly of irreligion has held to the lips of mankind we can not know. Of one thing alone we are certain, that our prayers are not without result, no matter when it may be that in God's providence the din of battle will cease and the last wreath of smoke rise from the cannon's mouth and melt away into the sky of peace. Blessed, at all events, are the merciful; for they shall obtain mercy.

Fittingly it was to the Sacred Heart that we cried out in the world's great need. It was the bloody implement of war, the world-conquering spear of the Roman legionary, which opened wide the Heart of Christ, that thence might flow the last drops of the Precious Blood. Christ had tasted for us dereliction and torment and agonies far greater than all the pains war could inflict upon the world's sufferers. He had triumphed in the midst of defeat and through death had achieved victory, that the conquered even more than the conquerors might look up to Him and gain strength as well as comfort, finding even in failure the source of supreme success.

To Him, therefore, we have turned, following the example set us by the Sovereign Pontiff. Who, indeed, was not moved at the thought of that white-robed, spiritual figure of the Vicar of Christ, casting himself in lowliness before the altar and calling in a voice filled with emotion upon the Heart of the Saviour to have pity and mercy, to inspire rulers and peoples with counsels of meekness and bring back love and peace to the discordant earth? Surely, the world is better for that prayer, and for the countless petitions that have since arisen to Heaven with it. How God in return may dispense His blessings we leave to His own infinite mercy and wisdom to decide. Whether the longed-for peace come soon or late, it suffices for us to trust in His love and know that our prayers can never be in vain. We still, therefore, shall continue to implore that war may cease, that enmities may be laid aside and, above all, that His holy will be done, in whose love alone the world can find its lasting peace.

Saints Made While You Wait

WE sometimes hear, "She is a saint," and, alas, more rarely, "He is a saint." The regular process of making a saint is a long and expensive one. The chief requisite is that you must be dead fifty years. Other difficult requisites are a host of witnesses to bear testimony to your heroic virtues and an officer, in whose duties we are all expert from daily practice, but who makes it hard for candidates of sanctity to escape his rake and finer-toothed comb and dissecting blade and high-power microscope. This dexterous official with the surgeon's case is the advocatus diaboli, styled in the President's English, the devil's advocate. Now in olden days the people made saints, as they made bishops and popes, by acclamation, or if they did not make them, they nominated them, and left it to the proper authority to ratify their choice. People every day block the canonization of so many saints that it is too bad the opposite process is not encouraged more.

"Let the people make saints," is a good campaign cry to go to the country with. "Canonized in America" should be a popular trademark. Of course there will be certain necessary qualifications, but we must not be too exacting. The people's standard of sanctity is high already. Men and women do not rush into conversation with the cry, "That's a saint!" But if any one declares, "She never says a word against a single person." "That will do," is the unanimous cry, "Canonize her." Next! "He never yet looked around before speaking to see whether any ladies were present." "Canonized!" say all. The people judge the health of the soul and its sanctity, as doctors judge the health of the body, by looking at the tongue, and in the case of the soul the test works better.

Keeping it up is another school for saints. We propose some candidates whose perseverance merits perhaps the degree. Here is a weak woman, looks fifty but is not near it, has been nursing a sick father who is helpless as a child but not as easily helped; works every day in a factory, is alone, except when bothered by a worse than helpless brother. What do you think? Had we not better call her, say, Saint Alpha Aquilae: that is, a star of the first magnitude. Here is candidate number two, already canonized by his mother who gives the testimony. Deponent states that her son is now over thirty, he does not drink; smokes occasionally but not to hurt any one; has never been known to swear, has to work on Sunday and can not, unhappily, go often to Mass; has given to herself, the mother, his pay-envelope, every week of his life, with his whole pay—Enough! Let him in at once and call him Saint Multiplicand, and let the nuns have a new name so that they wont have to be going back to Egypt for titles, calling themselves, Sister Psammitichus or the like. Here is the last candidate offered to-day: She is the mother of ten children. Hold! Her process of canonization is over; chant the Iste Confessor. What's that? The devil's advocate objects: "She was not present at the Euchre and Dance for Nativity Parish." "Why, Mr. Advocate, she made the parish." Objection is at once withdrawn.

This is a test of a true saint. He never knows he is one although the whole world unites in considering him a saint. Tell any of the above that they are doing something extraordinary, and they will not believe it. They are doing nothing at all, they feel, and will continue to do nothing at all until St. Peter closes and locks the gates of heaven behind them. Then, looking around, they will inquire in amazement, "When did we do anything to deserve this?"

It may be objected that this new process of canonization acts too swiftly. We do not think so. Saints may be made in a second. One great sinner had seven devils exorcised with one word, "because she loved much"; another sinner was dismissed forgiven, to sin no more, "because no one condemned her"; another was sanctified by a look; another, a robber and a murderer, was canonized as he was put to death for his crimes. No, the process is not too swift. Volunteers are wanted. As you go through the parish hereafter, canonize a saint at every house. There will be devil's advocates enough, don't you fear, to delay the process.

LITERATURE

Twenty "Don'ts" of Science

IT is a remarkable fact that until comparatively recent years there has been a general impression that no development of science worth mentioning took place before our time, and that the biological sciences, and particularly such applied scientific departments as medicine and surgery, had utterly failed to develop. Indeed, many men, who thought themselves well-read and who were reputed well-educated, argued that since there had been no development of science before our age, there must be some strong reason for it, so they fixed upon the Church as the scapegoat. For she, it was assumed, was the power which prevented, or at least discouraged, all really scientific investigations. Here in America Professor Draper and President White, with this for a thesis, wrote books that are widely known and still widely read.

But we have changed all that. We know that the medieval universities, far from suppressing science in any way, were actually scientific universities. Above all, the medical schools of these old-time universities developed magnificently, and their text-books, which have recently been republished, are very valuable contributions to medical and surgical science. Though most of these works were first printed in the time of the Renaissance, they had been gathering dust on the shelves of libraries until a generation ago.

As a consequence of renewed acquaintance with these books all our ideas about the state of medicine and surgery, and regarding the development of the biological sciences in the Middle Ages, have been revolutionized. We know that often during the past eight centuries men have made remarkable advances in medicine and surgery, anticipating some of the great "discoveries" only recently made. At the last meeting of the International Medical Congress a special section on the history of medicine was organized, because it was felt that that department not only presented details of interest to antiquarians, but because it enabled the present generation to face more critically many problems concerning the nature and treatment of disease, for much of the experience gained in preceding centuries had unfortunately been lost.

It is easy, therefore, to understand how many wrong impressions with regard to the history of science are now current. Instead of that almost universal neglect of scientific research, which had been supposed, there was, on the contrary, lively interest in such questions and those who write loosely about the history of science are sure to make even greater mistakes here than in general history. As the newer development of the history of science is even less generally known than the recent developments in political and educational history, editors, writers and lecturers frequently fall into ridiculous errors because their knowledge is not "up-to-date." So these "Twenty 'Don'ts' of Science" are gathered together with the object of preventing "educated" people from dropping into absurdities with regard to the history of science:

Don't refer lightly and confidently to a papal bull which forbade the study of anatomy by dissection. The document referred to is easily obtained, and you will find that instead of the supposed prohibition of anatomy it is a wise hygienic regulation. (See "The Popes and Science.")

Don't cite, though many have done so, a papal bull forbidding chemistry, for when you read the text of that document it proves to be a statute prohibiting counterfeiting.

Don't quote the famous bull against Halley's comet. That bull has never been found. Within five years of the time when it is supposed to have been issued, Regiomontanus, often called the father of modern astronomy, was invited to Rome to become papal astronomer.

Don't listen to that nonsense about ecclesiastical opposition to surgery. One of the most wonderful surgeons of history is Theodoric of Lucca, who was a bishop; the father of modern French surgery, Guy de Chauliac, was a clergyman.

Don't hint that in order to make money by pilgrimages, relics, shrines and prayers, the Church discouraged the development of medicine and surgery. The greatest list of scientific doctors in the history of medicine is that of the papal physicians.

Don't fail to recall that Copernicus, the great founder of the Copernican theory, was a canon, owed his post-graduate education to the cathedral chapter, spent ten years in Italy and was eternally grateful to his Italian masters.

Don't forget that pious scientists have existed. Linacre, the Englishman to whom medicine and scholarship owe so much, became a priest toward the end of his life.

Don't forget that the pious Galvani was buried at his own request in the habit of St. Francis, Ampère's favorite devotion was his beads, Pasteur was a devout communicant, Volta scoffed at the notion of having any doubts about faith.

Don't boast of our development of dentistry: the filling of teeth with gold and other metals, the capping of teeth, various methods of dental prosthesis and even transplantation of teeth are all old inventions.

Don't talk about sanitation as new. The medieval people made regulations that enabled them to get rid of leprosy when it was nearly as common as tuberculosis is now, and we shall do very well if we succeed in obliterating our folk disease as successfully as they did.

Don't forget to look up the pure food and drug laws of medieval Italy before boasting about our enlightenment in this matter. In those days the purveyor of impure drugs was hanged. A cheating druggist's stock was confiscated.

Don't boast of the perfection of our medical education until you read the laws of the Middle Ages. Before a young physician was allowed to set up for himself three years of preliminary work at the university were required and then four years at the study of medicine, besides an extra year's practice under a doctor or surgeon.

Don't quote the Galileo case to prove that the Church has hampered science as a policy. Cardinal Newman, whose logic is unquestioned and unquestionable, has suggested that if this is the only case that can be cited in 700 years, then it must be considered the exception which proves the rule. And Augustus de Morgan agreed with Newman.

Don't quote Galileo's É pur se muove: "And yet it moves." That expression was not heard of for considerably more than a century after Galileo's day, and is then found for the first time in the seventh edition of a French biographical dictionary, though it had not occurred in the Galileo article of the sixth edition.

Don't talk about Galileo's dungeon, nor his years of imprisonment. He never was in prison for an hour. He was sentenced to remain in the custody of a friend, and after a year his son was made his custodian. The principal part of his punishment—Poor man!—was the recital of the Seven Penitential Psalms every day for three years.

Don't think that science is explaining mysteries. Science multiplies mysteries and the more we know the more we know that we do not know. Professor Ramsay, the great English physicist, says that as a young man he started out with the idea that he would never accept anything that he did not understand, but he found that it was almost impossible to meet with anything that he could fully understand.

Don't write about a knowledge of science as making more difficult a belief in a personal God. Lord Kelvin, the greatest of modern physicists, declared that science demonstrates the existence of a Creator.

Don't suggest that when a man knows a great deal about scientific medicine he loses his faith. Morgagni, Malpighi, Laennec, Johann Müller, the father of modern German medicine; Theodor Schwann, the father of the cell doctrine; Claude Bernard, the greatest of modern physiologists, and above all Louis Pasteur, the greatest contributor to modern medicine, were actually practical Catholics.

Don't forget the remark Dean Stanley made as he lay on a sick bed from which it was thought he would never rise: "Life looks very different when viewed from the horizontal." Life and its philosophy look very different when viewed from the gathering shadows of the end of life.

Don't forget Francis Bacon's well-known expression "A little philosophy"—by which he meant natural philosophy, or as we call it, science—"inclineth man's mind, to atheism, but depth in philosophy bringeth men's minds about to religion."

REVIEWS

The Society of the Sacred Heart. By JANET ERSKINE STUART. Roehampton, London: The Convent of the Sacred Heart.

The late Mother Stuart had the rare gift of saying much, and saying it well, in a very few words. Hers was not, it has been remarked, an intellect of an unusually high order. But for all practical purposes it was something better. It was a trained intellect, sharp and clear, with a way, almost disconcerting at times, of going straight to the heart of things. One might expect the present little volume to treat exclusively of the world-wide Society which Mother Stuart guarded so faithfully and with much success, during a very troublous period. In a sense this expectation is not disappointed. But Mother Stuart, in setting forth the peculiar genius of her Society, has given an explanation of the fundamental principles of the religious life, which is a marvel of clear and concise exposition. An overworked phrase helps many a lame critic over a stile, especially if the phrase happens to express a literal truth. By leave of the purist, then, it may be said that Mother Stuart's book has an appeal that is extraordinarily wide.

First, to her own daughters in religion, to whom the book is her legacy. These will gladly reread the exhortations to religious perfection penned by a Mother who always added to her teaching the force of her own example. Then, to the thousands of women whose good fortune it was to be brought under the strong, yet gentle, influence of these faithful, self-denying daughters of the Sacred Heart. As a book of spiritual reading, especially for young religious, it would be most useful. In these simple pages, the Catholic laity will find that information on the spirit of the consecrated life, with which, sad to relate, many well-educated Catholics are strangely and shockingly unfamiliar. To the educated non-Catholic, in search of similar information on this folly of the Cross, no better book could be given. He will here find his difficulties answered, not polemically, but by a calm statement of the Gospel principles on which the religious life is founded and, by a convincing account utterly free from exaggeration, of the manner in which these principles are made to count in daily life.

This little book, the voice of one who being dead, yet speaketh, is certain to work an immense amount of good. Mother Stuart's "The Education of Catholic Girls" is, in the reviewer's opinion, easily the best book on the subject in the English language. The volumes of Mother Stuart's writings already accessible to the public, make one look forward with eagerness to her "Instructions for Religious Communities," which, it is reported, are now being prepared for publication.

The Scotch-Irish in America. By HENRY JONES FORD Princeton, N. J.: Princeton University Press. $2.00.

At this time, when hyphenated Americans are under a ban, it would seem inopportune to add a mythical combination to the real varieties; but "Scotch-Irish" and "Anglo-Saxons" are privileged. It were almost as easy to construct a bulky volume on Irish snakes as on the "Scotch-Irish" race; yet Professor Ford of Princeton has managed to achieve 611 pages on the thesis that at the time of the Ulster plantation Scotland was peopled by Saxons, Teutons, Scandinavians, Flemish, Picts—anything but Celts, who had been largely exterminated; that the planters made up of this Teutonic mixture and a larger number of English Teutons, having ousted the barbarous Irish of Ulster, became "Scotch-Irish," sudden and unawares; that the descendants of these formed almost exclusively the immigrants that came from Ireland to America up to the nineteenth century, and that they and all others of Irish origin who distinguished themselves here were always "Scotch-Irish," even when they styled themselves otherwise. The professor is chary of references, seldom tells from what Irish ports the numerous Irish immigrants sailed to the colonies, and never spreads out their names from State and city records, so that the reader may pass judgment on genealogies; and though they themselves, in every passage cited descriptive of their origin, write themselves down as plain Irish, and not one is found in which they claim to be "Scotch-Irish," yet the author chooses invariably so to designate them, and on page after page multiplies the hyphenated miscegenation till the thesis is proved by iteration.

Ethnologically and historically Irish-Irish would be a better designation. Ireland, which was called Scotia up to the twelfth century, colonized western Caledonia in its pre-Christian days, and thereafter Christianized and civilized the whole country, giving it a king, dynasty, literature, name, and national life. The Princetonian claim that the later prevalence of Saxon dialect in the Lowlands, where Gaelic names still predominate, proves the English origin of its people, would also prove that all others of English speech, even our Afro-Americans, are Anglo-Saxon. The English-speaking Scots, having degenerated from Gaelic Christianity into Calvinistic iconoclasts and joy-killers, King James transplanted them to "extirp" their Gaelic cousins of Ulster. The professor's account of the whole abominable procedure follows the most bigoted English versions, now thoroughly discredited, and he grounds his hearty approval on the necessity of civilizing the barbarous Irish. Douglas Hyde's contrast between the lofty tone and exquisite art of the Irish poets of the period and the vulgar and murderous Calvinistic psalm-singers is evidently unknown at Princeton. However, contact with the undegenerate Gaels improved them, and later kings, having filched them also of religious and economic rights and privileges, the Ulster Presbyterians, fraternizing with the Catholics in common resistance to oppression, and losing much of their Calvinistic dourness, soon became Irish; and, fleeing to America with burning hate of their oppressors, both entered with zest into the Revolution, contributed most to its success, and made possible the religious liberty clauses in our Constitution.

They were just plain Irish, whatever their remote origin, and, whether Protestant or Catholic, Friendly Sons of St. Patrick. In Boston, New York, Philadelphia, St. Patrick was their patron. The medal of the Philadelphia Friendly Sons, and which they presented to Washington on his adoption, showed St. Patrick crushing a snake, and Liberty resting on a harp as she joined Hibernia and America—surely no "Scotch-Irish" device. These were mainly Protestants, but the predominance of Irish Catholics in colonial immigration is clearly proved in T. H. Maginniss' thoroughly documented work "The Irish Contribution to American Independence." (Cf. AMERICA, Vol. IX, 16, 17.) "Scotch-Irish" means Protestant Irish, if anything. It is an afterthought to filch the Catholic Gael of American distinction. Mr. Ford has not filched it of ethnic absurdity.

An Introduction to the Mystical Life. By the ABBÉ P. LEJEUNE. Translated from the French by BASIL LEVETT. New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.25.

Practical Mysticism. By EVELYN UNDERHILL. New York: Dutton & Co. $1.00.

The former of these volumes is appropriately named. An introduction to the mystical life it is in the fullest sense, and as such it is a pleasure to recommend it most cordially. Not because it contains anything novel, but precisely because it is so clear and so faithful a digest of the teaching of acknowledged masters in the field of mystical theology, will the work be of the greatest service to directors, and to all who aspire to the higher life. Whenever an authority is cited, the writer takes pains to give the exact reference; this begets confidence, and may be taken as an index of the scholarly thoroughness apparent throughout the volume. In the preface, it is stated emphatically that the mystical life is not with any infallible certainty the outcome of our own effort, however rightly that effort may have been made; it is God's free gift to whom He pleases and when He pleases. Our part consists in cultivating the soil to render it fit to receive the heavenly showers. The first chapter contains a brief but masterly exposition of what is understood by the mystical life; in the following five chapters, the author points out some of the practices which form the best dispositions for the same, while the book closes with a searching analysis of the transition of the generous soul from the ordinary spiritual life, through the prayer of simple advertence and, through what St. John of the Cross has so fittingly called "the night of the senses," into the mystic city. The writer is avowedly an enemy to vagueness of thought and expression; his language throughout is clear, succinct, kindly and alike free from technicalities and idle speculations. The translator has done his work well.

In "Practical Mysticism" the reviewer has to do with a book of a very different stamp. Most of the qualities which he has praised in the former volume, are here sadly wanting. Miss Underhill (Mrs. Stuart Moore) intends her work for normal minds, yet the average reader, even if he has had sufficient grit to wade through it, will carry away from the volume very little enlightenment. As the book goes on, the impression grows that the writer is often employing words, not to disclose but to enshroud her thought. Whether or not she believes in a personal God is not at all clear, and she shows no acquaintance with the supernatural. If Miss Underhill is not a Monist, her words not unfrequently leave themselves open to grave misinterpretation, for, consciously or otherwise, she borrows freely from the language of pantheism. The volume is verbose, nebulous, evasive, as well as doctrinally objectionable, and, after a dreary ramble, the reviewer laid it aside, without learning either what mysticism is or the author's mind on the subject.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Those who have read Dr. James J. Walsh's "Sixty Historical 'Don'ts'" in the Catholic Mind for February 22 will find equally interesting his "Fifty 'Don'ts' of Science," which appear in the current number of that periodical. Some of these "Don'ts" will be found in this number of AMERICA. The March 22 Mind also contains Mr. Nelson Hume's excellent paper on "Catholics in the Y. M. C. A." and it is followed by several shorter articles which show the true character of that organization. The number concludes with a summary of our new Catholic statistics.

Here is some recent music: For the service of the Three Hours on Good Friday, J. Fischer & Bro. have published in octavo "The Seven Last Words" ($0.25), with verses and music by the Rev. John G. Hacker, S.J. These hymn tunes—one for each of the seven words of Our Lord on the cross—are written for solo or unison chorus with organ accompaniment. They are called "simple" in a prefatory note by the composer, but they are not of the kind that will immediately find favor with a congregational choir, nor are their accompaniments, which are harmonized in the modern manner, likely to lessen the apparent austerity of the tunes. There is, however, a subdued attractiveness to these hymns which repetition, no doubt, will serve to disclose. Because of the evident care and earnest workmanship manifested in their composition, these hymns deserve to be commended to all choirs called upon to provide unison music for the service of the Three Hours. Under the title "Laudes Vespertinæ sive Thesaurus Cantionum" ($0.35), Fr. Pustet & Co. have collected together in a handy volume a number of Gregorian hymns and selections from the proper of the Mass, the Vesper service and from Compline. For church choirs and communities that use Gregorian to any extent this volume ought to prove a convenience. For the use of choirs, Rev. Edw. J. Murphy has compiled "Latin Pronounced for Choirs" (H. L. Kilner, Philadelphia, $0.25), a small manual of the more usual Latin hymns, wherein each syllable is phonetically spelled out according to the Roman-Italian method of pronunciation. A companion volume, "Latin Pronounced for Altar Boys" ($0.25), spells out in the same way the prayers at Mass. Luckhardt & Belder have published a song entitled "Irish Names," words by John Ludlow, music by Mamie Graham Destamps, in which much is said and sung of the "Names wid a body an' bones an' a soul to thim." All concerned should examine this song to see if their names are properly recorded in the chorus.

Priests who are eager to increase their usefulness as confessors will be glad to know of a pamphlet entitled "Examen Conscientiae seu Methodus Excipiendi Confessiones Variis in Linguis" (Pustet, $0.20) which Father Fulgentius M. Krebs, O.M.C., has prepared. In German, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Polish are arranged in parallel tables well-worded questions the priest needs to ask penitents, and the ritual and prayers for the administration of the last sacraments are added.——Somewhat similar in its scope is "Religious Terms: One Hundred and One Signs" (The Xavier Ephpheta Society, 30 W. 16th St., New York, $0.10), a little book the Rev. M. R. McCarthy, S.J., has published. The ideographic signs used by our Catholic deaf mutes when they converse about religious practices are very interesting and expressive. Confession, for instance, is indicated by crossing the fingers of both hands, "forming a screen, held at the ear"; justice: "the thumb and forefinger of each hand forming a circumference and teetering, indicating a balance"; obstinancy: "the back of the open hands held up at either temple, indicating a donkey"; Church: "'C' resting on the back of the left hand as if on a rock." The manual alphabet is also given.

EDUCATION

Content of the Youthful Mind

CONTENT! That's the word. If you are a teacher, you have heard it. The dictionary admits a doubt as to the accent, but no intellectual has any hesitancy on that point. Lay the stress on the first syllable. Lay it strong. Content! The dictionary says that the word is ordinarily used in the plural, but an intellectual is nothing ordinary. If you want to be an intellectual, use the word in the singular. Say content. Do not say contents.

CRASS PERSONS

The content of the youthful mind! Dear teacher, seated at the feet of wisdom in educational meeting and convention, you have heard that expression. You have felt it dropped on your head. Its weight was leaden because it was spoken with the complete conviction of a scientific conclusion. Do you doubt the content of the youthful mind? What ignorance! What pedagogical incapacity! Experts in pedagogy are sure of the content. Some of them have not had much, or perhaps any, acquaintance with youthful minds; they have not had the chance to hear the hollow rattle of the empty sconce as you have had who are a teacher, but by reason of this lack of actual experience, they are all the surer of the content. The psychology of pedagogy vouches for it! Can you doubt it after that? Yes, even after that there are some teachers who doubt it. Not so long ago a teacher of English in a State Normal School dared to say that even in the minds of a good many normal pupils there was no content. And this in the face of the psychology of pedagogy! How unspeakably crass!

DRY WELLS

Yes, it is crass. It is as crass as solid, unyielding fact. To hear some educational pedants talk of the content of the youthful mind, one might easily conclude that they believed either that the mind is filled with innate knowledge or that it can evolve thought out of nothing. A great deal of fun has been poked at Macaulay's schoolboy, but it is generally understood that he worked hard in order to gain his large and varied store of information. His inventor is not supposed to have claimed that his infant phenomenon was born with a mind that was a living well, and that all the child had to do was to dip in and draw forth knowledge; in fact, that the mind was an artesian well, and that the knowledge simply ran over. Macaulay knew what literary composition meant, and if he thought of the youthful mind as a well at all, it was as of a well which was empty by nature and which had to be filled by hard labor at the pumps. What a practical teacher rejects is the arrogant assumption of pedagogical theorists that English composition is a process of drawing thought out of minds into which no thought has ever been put.

These teachers know as well as pedagogical experts that literature is personal thought. They recognize that it is the original idea which is the test of the literary artist, but has the average pupil any ideas, let alone original ones?

SEEING NOTHING

In his autobiography Sir William Butler says: "Had it been possible for any one child to tell us exactly what he saw when he first opened his eyes, that earliest impression of the world would probably have proved the most interesting brain-picture ever given by an individual to the general public." But Sir William Butler was never a teacher. Had he been, he would not have written thus. The teacher of an average primary or secondary class would say that the child so opening his eyes probably saw nothing. All of us, no doubt, on one or other occasion, have sat looking at an object, perhaps staring at it for a length of time, and seen nothing. We call it abstraction. We do not give young people credit for it, but teachers know that young people, at least many of them, are gifted with extraordinary powers of abstraction. We read in the lives of some of the youthful saints that they knew the ways only to church and to school. In this virtue the average schoolboy outstrips the saints. He does not know even those ways. Ask him what he sees daily on his way to and from school, and you will find that he sees next to nothing. Ask him with what he keeps his mind busy while making the trip and he will come very near the truth when he answers: "Nothing."

This is rather discouraging when you are looking for the content of the youthful mind. It is more than discouraging if you are blamed for not discovering the said content. It is certain that boys and girls of school age have countless experiences, but they do not seem to experience them. All knowledge comes through the senses. Young people seem to be hearing, seeing, sensing all day long, but an investigation leads one to think that it is only seeming. "Merely this and nothing more." The senses appear to reflect rather than to refract impressions. We express the phenomenon by saying that young people do not observe. The youthful mind is capable of containing much, but in reality it contains very little. Considering its varied experience, it ought to have a content but, as a matter of fact, it usually has not and it never will have until it is taught to observe.

Creative Power

But what of creative power? If you deny the content of the youthful mind, do you not throw out of the count all that has ever been urged for originality. Can there be any literary work without creation? No, but what does literary creation mean?

Edmund Burke may be said, in the literary sense, to have created India. He never lived there and still knew it better than many who had. That was creative imagination. What did it mean? It meant the ability to reconstruct in imagination the peoples and places of which he had read, to bring together in one picture the facts and faces he had seen in many. What would Tennyson, Milton or Shakespere be without creative imagination? They surely possessed more of the gift than we can expect to find in any pupil or class of pupils we may hope to meet, but even in them what does the power mean? It means at the most that they were able to take different threads of thought and weave them into one picture. It means exactly what the word composition signifies. It is a true philosophy and one as old as Aristotle that there is nothing in the mind which has not been derived through the senses. This does not mean that the mind can not divide and combine what it thus receives into shapes and forms so new and original that men will not be able to recognize the source, but it does mean that the mind does not, in the strict sense of the word, create. It does not bring into being something which did not exist, either in itself or in any principle. The combination of thought wrought by the mind is as new as a statue fresh-hewn from the stone, but every element in the composition is old. To originate the very elements of thought would be to create in the strictest sense of the scholastic term, and that is a power belonging to God alone.

The Radical Error

If brought face to face with it, the pedagogical experts who prate of content would in all probability disavow any concept of literary creation so extreme as this. Still one can not listen to them long without coming to the conclusion that, if they have any theory of thought, it must be either a doctrine such as this or a system of innate ideas. One is as impossible as the other, and neither squares with experience.

Content, or contents, every mind must have before it attempts composition. But every teacher with any experience knows that, while there are exceptions, the average class of primary, secondary or even college students must be made to impress before they can be expected to express anything. It is the seemingly complete disregard for this process of impression which stirs the bile of teacher against these exploiters of the content. Those who have had experience in the classroom know that even when they have painstakingly led the mind to think, it is another struggle to teach it to set forth what it contains. To dilate on this difficulty is not the purpose of this paper. It is enough for the present, to insist in the name of teachers suffering from the scourge of certain scientific experts in pedagogy, that the mind, at least if it be a normal and not an abnormal mind, must gather thought before it can express it.

SOCIOLOGY

Doing God's Work

IT is an old, old story, but ever new, like a classic. It thrilled us years ago, when generous and unsophisticated hearts beat in these bosoms. Perhaps it would thrill us again, were we thrown into its atmosphere of muted violins to gaze upon the dimmed lights, star-pointed in wet eyes. It is the ancient story of persecuted virtue, set forth in the melodrama entitled, "Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model."

The Tireless Villain

Nellie was surely an indestructible heroine. In the early part of the action, as you remember, the villain pushed her off the Brooklyn Bridge. Was he foiled? He was, for Nellie either swam ashore, or was picked up by a battleship from the neighboring navy yard. Memory dims these early pictures, and details merge, as in a Corot. At their next meeting, our heroine was cast overboard from an Atlantic liner. But virtue again triumphed, and Nellie lived to be thrust under a descending elevator by this singularly resourceful villain. Once more his plans went astray, and in despair, the villain cried in his most rumbling and heart-thrilling tones, "Nellie, why do you fear me?"

The moral of this pretty tale is not precisely obvious. It seems a trifle irreverent to compare our beautiful Catholic charities with the hapless Nellie, but the villain is surely a blood-brother, or at least a cousin, to the promoters of commercialized philanthropy, and the Charity Trusts, now springing up in many American cities. But it should also be added that Catholics are not in the least afraid of the villain.

Anti-Social Brothers

"We are not working against the sectarian institutions," is the cry of this gentry. To a certain extent, this statement is true. Their plans are far deeper. Sincerest friendship, they say, can not disguise the fact that Catholic institutions, while they may have rendered some limited social service in a ruder age, stand in sore need of certain immediate reforms. To begin with, Brothers and Sisters, brought up in convents, are notoriously lacking in the social view. Although they and their spiritual ancestors have been training children with notable success for a good many centuries, this tradition contains little of value, when measured with the knowledge which a wide-eyed damsel can pick up in two or three years at a School of Philanthropy. Teach your grandmother to suck eggs? Why, certainly. Grandmother died a good many years ago, and it was only in the second decade of the twentieth century that the Government issued its monograph on the distinction between good eggs and bad. Priests and nuns, it is whispered, actually put piety above plumbing in the scale of importance. They actually teach the children things about sin when, as is well known, what was once called sin is nothing but a temporary blurring of one's orientation, for which the individual is responsible, if at all, only in a minor degree. Worse, they lead the children to believe that this sin is forgiven by some mystic process in which God, prayer and the Sacraments are involved. This is highly unscientific, and may readily become anti-social. So-called "naughty" children should consult not a priest but a physician. Very probably they are afflicted with adenoids or need glasses. If this diagnosis fails, search the family-tree. There is little doubt that a ticket-of-leave grandfather will be found hiding among the branches.

CHARITY ON A PAYING BASIS

It is obvious, then, to the meanest intellect, that these Brothers and Sisters are unfit guardians of our wayward or unfortunate children. Catholic institutions can never amount to much, until these strabismic individuals are sent packing. Let them be replaced by graduates of some school of philanthropy, carefully trained in "the larger, wider, clearer vision of social service," which teaches that, on the whole, the less we have of God and anti-social religious observances, such as Christian marriage, kosher and the Friday abstinence, the better. As general supervisors and efficiency experts, let us call in the social directors and the commercialized philanthropists, offering, to be sure, a generous salary, for, as we have been told even to satiety, "a low grade salary attracts only a low grade man." When these few trifling reforms have been made, and the Brothers and Sisters immured in monasteries to do penance for their social sinfulness, Catholics may feel at liberty to dot the land with houses of relief and correction, with never a peep of protest from the "large-minded" persons, whose present aim looks suspiciously like an attempt to put Christian charity on a commercial basis.

CRUEL, ONLY TO BE KIND

This is what the incorporators of Charity Trusts really mean when they aver that they love us, but, frankly, that we must not expect them to be blind to our obvious faults. "It was all very well to dissemble your love," runs the ancient lilt, "But why did you kick me down stairs?" The Charity Trusts approve of us highly in the Sunday papers, but they feel it a duty to point out that our concept of charity and reform is radically wrong. They are cruel, they protest, only to be kind. Very possibly the villain, to return to our limping parable, which every moment seems more unfit, had some idea of correcting a temperamental perversity when he pushed Nellie off the Brooklyn Bridge. Death, it is true, straightens out temperamental kinks very effectively, but it is not a very good cure because it also removes the subject in whom they existed.

Our Catholic charities would be neither charitable nor Catholic, did they adopt the program proposed by modern philanthropy. For that philanthropy eliminates God by declaring Him of secondary importance. It is true, fortunately, that some of its professors are better than their principles. It is also true, that some of its followers can write so touchingly of "religion as a social force," that one might think himself listening to a newly-discovered sermon of St. Vincent de Paul, until from the cloud of words the clear fact emerges that, in the view of these sociologists, religion means little more than sentimentality, or an absolutely false and unreal estheticism. A lady, with leanings to sociological research, has recently declared that a woman now in prison, a woman whose education and position did not keep her from murdering her two babies, could never have had this impulse, when suddenly she was called upon to pay the price of sin, could she have been taken habitually into some cool twilight grot, there to listen to a Beethoven symphony.

HOW MUCH ARE YOU WORTH?

Religion put on a par with a love of old porcelain, or a delicate ear for music, is not religion at all. One wonders what would have happened to Pippa, singing not in a poem, but in Italy. Frequently a nasty mixture is the result of diluting religion with alleged estheticism. Eliminate the concept of another world from your schemes of sociological reconstruction, and you are considering not the whole of the problem, nor even the half. But in view of our participation in immortality, it is not inadequate, but fundamentally false. For we have not here an abiding resting-place, but seek that which is everlasting, even the humblest, the most sorely-afflicted among us.

Mr. Carnegie has taught the undiscriminating to value a college by the amount of its endowment. The rule is fast being carried over into the field of social service. "We have abundance of experience to show," writes Mr. E. T. Hartman in the Survey for February 20, "that the small salary attracts the small man." Charitable work, recognized as a means of livelihood, necessarily involves the idea of financial remuneration. That, at least, we know from "abundant experience." Charity means working for God. Sociology means that a salary, if not the motive, is the sine qua non of service. The distinction is admittedly tenuous.

CHRISTIAN VERSUS COMMERCIAL CHARITY

Mr. Hartman's complaint stresses strongly the difference between commercial and Christian charity, and the distinction is further emphasized by the Report of the City Trustees of St. Mary's Industrial School of Baltimore, an institution conducted by the Xaverian Brothers. As the School receives city and State aid, these corporations are represented by their Boards of Trustees. Under date of December 29, 1914, the City Trustees report:

> The Brothers are men well skilled and well educated, capable and efficient, and would command high salaries in the world in the lines of work in which they are engaged. Yet each of these Brothers, regardless of position and work, from the Superintendent down to the Brother just entering the work, is allowed the sum of one hundred and fifty dollars per year for his labor, a stipend so small as to seem ridiculous. But then these Brothers are laboring, not for a pecuniary reward, but for the love of God, and in an effort to better the boy and help him grow into a good, honest, industrious man, a credit to the community and a useful citizen thereof. These Brothers are surely doing God's work.

One hundred and fifty dollars a year for expert professional services, services for twenty-four hours a day, and fifty-two weeks a year; exclusive services, too, regarded as one's highest duty. Let us have a few figures, so loved of the modern sociologist. A mathematical friend informs me (for I lisp in numbers), that this princely stipend means a weekly wage of $2.88, or a sum considerably less than the remuneration allotted to the lowest kind of unskilled labor.

And the reason? The non-Catholic City Trustees of Baltimore may answer for all our Brothers and Sisters.

"They are doing God's work." PAUL L. BLAKELY, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

"Episcopalian," writing to the New York Sun, correctly points out that while the Protestant Episcopal Church permits remarriage, when the divorce has been secured "on the statutory grounds allowed by the State of New York," the Catholic Church forbids the remarriage of divorced persons, no matter what the grounds of separation were. "But," continues the correspondent, "there have been instances in each Church where remarriage has been allowed" and he thinks this an inconsistency. It is indeed, but the Sun correspondent could write a new page in history, could he adduce a single instance in which the Catholic Church has allowed remarriage to a validly married man or woman.

"High Church" Anglicans are just now delirious with delight. A wandering "Orthodox" Archbishop, Germanos by name, high priest of a Syrian town, happened into Quebec at the time of the consecration of the Anglican Bishop of that place. And lo! His Grace, though refusing "to take part in the laying on of hands," "communicated with the Consecrators and the new made bishop, thus testifying to his belief in the efficacy of the English rite and the validity of English orders." This is a little confusing. In view of the Archbishop's status, the refusal to lay on hands may be quite as significant as "communicating." Indeed the former may be more significant than the latter. And one action contradicts the other: conclusions therefore are hazardous. But then uneasy people clutch at straws in the hope of support: the Anglicans are uneasy about the validity of their Orders: Germanos is a straw set up against his Church which has already officially refused to recognize Anglican Orders.

Not long ago a Chicago reader of Harper's Weekly who describes himself as "a poor, sad soul feeling out into the night, longing for light," wrote that he wanted in the time still given him "to become associated with a body of men who are bent on furthering the kingdom of righteousness, here and now, cost what it may." He is seeking a religion free from any special doctrine of "sociology, charitology, lambasting or excoriating," and "Billy Sunday noise." The editor of Harper's Weekly seems to think there is no existing Church that will fully meet this inquirer's needs and advises him to "become one of those isolated, believing, sacrificing Christians he talks about." Did that groping correspondent ever hear of the Catholic Church? The ideal he describes can be realized only in her, and in her by no means "isolated" children he will find innumerable "believing, sacrificing Christians" who are "bent on furthering the kingdom of righteousness here and now" and who abominate pagan "sociology" and "Billy Sundayism."

There is a review called the Atlantic Monthly published in a quaint old town famous for many reasons. The magazine is considered proper: prim mammas have been known to warn the son and heir never to say anything which he would be ashamed to have appear on its pages. Despite this there is a great deal of the "Round Head" about the review, a self-sufficiency, never so apparent as when its writers treat of Catholicism. "Mon Amie" in the March number is a splendid illustration of the Atlantic's spirit. A proud, shallow, emotional, gossipy and apparently hypocritical "slip of a girl" is made the messenger of a hideous accusation against "the priest in charge of one of the largest Parisian churches." No chance of a libel suit there: the writer has his wits about him, even though his style smacks of a youth of four and twenty. He is ecstatic too or nearly so, for he exclaims in a fine frenzy: "The amazing soul of modern France!—which pervades even the walls of convents with its spirit of free criticism and its terrible play of intelligence!" Why, yes indeed! and when the French measure up to the Atlantic's standard of intelligence, convent walls will tumble down and the streets will be piled high with discarded coifs and wimples and veils and habits and birettas and cassocks and missals and breviaries and chasubles and albs and stoles and maniples, and everybody will take the Atlantic Monthly for consolation and uplift, that is, if it does not become too dull, a danger when intelligence shall have destroyed the object of attack, Catholicism and its ministers.

The delegates elected to meet in convention for the revision of the constitution of the State of New York, will assemble at Albany on April 6 to begin formal proceedings. The leader in the deliberations will be ex-Senator Root who was recently welcomed back to New York at a public banquet, given by former friends and associates. There were many speakers. Among them was Mr. Joseph Choate who, with Mr. Root, shaped the policy of the convention of 1894, which left behind it so many unpleasant memories. According to the report the former gentleman told how "he and Mr. Root lived in Bishop Doane's house at Albany all through the hot summer and worked out the amendments upheld by consciousness of duty and occasional doses of Scotch whiskey." This was a most imprudent remark: there will be a thousand protests against the double stimulant in play at the last convention, the whiskey and the Bishop. This time the Prohibitionists will flood Albany with grape-juice and the secularists will clamor to have the amendments written in the house of a "non-sectarian" bishop. Otherwise "Catholics" as usual, will "dominate" the convention.

During the past week the press, sensational and otherwise, has shocked many good people by proclaiming that French and Belgian priests have told girls in distress from the action of soldiers to "become other Herods." This, of course, makes capital material for a newspaper; it has the one necessary characteristic for catchy "news": It is not true. Under date of March 5 the London Universe reports that the Chairman of the Westminster Federation says:

> The Executive Committee had communicated on the matter with Bishop De Wachter, Cardinal Mercier's Auxiliary in London, and had been assured that such advice was never given by a Catholic priest. The Bishop thought that a public protest should be made in the Catholic papers, as the story had been circulated all over the world.

Alas, for the public protest! The story will appear and reappear, and the editors of Catholic papers will be deluged with letters of inquiry and expostulations.

The French clergy who are fighting so valiantly in the army of their country, deserve all honor and praise. They are heroes, every one of them. But our enthusiasm for their dauntless courage should not lessen our desire that a priest might never be obliged, under any circumstances, to shed the blood of a fellow man. St. Thomas expresses the mind of the Church by saying:

> He who each day participates at the altar in the passion of Our Lord, Jesus Christ, should take no part in the work of death. It is not fitting that he should shed blood. Rather should he be ready to shed his own blood for Christ and in union with Him, thus giving evidence in his life of that which he accomplishes in his ministry.

The law of a contemptible Government ignores all this and the priests, France's best citizens, out of respect for authority, obey the law. "On the chair of Moses have sitten the Scribes and Pharisees. All things therefore whatsoever they shall say to you, observe and do: but according to their works do ye not."

Letter

to Rosary Sellers

The key to open your door to increased trade is good dealing in rosaries.

Is good dealing so rare that a good dealer is conspicuous? Not in most goods; but rosaries worth $2.00 are often sold for $3.00 and more.

A rosary is worth what it will fetch; or, rather, it is worth the cost of making and selling. There are staple goods, and goods not staple. It costs very little trouble to sell staple goods, but a great deal of trouble to sell unstaple goods.

Are rosaries staple or not? Some are, some are not.

What does staple mean? It means regular and satisfactory, price and all: wanted by everybody, and within the means of everybody. That is why it costs so little trouble to sell such a thing.

And the Vatti rosary at from $2.00 up is such a thing.

Only send your address; you shall have particulars.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable to Teachers and Students in Catholic Schools only.

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Write for details.

A cheap unsanitary refrigerator frequently poisons the milk and other foods kept in it—these tainted germ laden foods poison you. Does it pay?

Physicians assert that many cases of dangerous illness—particularly with children—can be traced directly to unsanitary refrigeration. Don't run the risk of slowly poisoning your whole family with poisonous oxides by using an inefficient refrigerator.

McCray Sanitary Refrigerators

are endorsed by physicians, architects and refrigeration experts and are used by the U. S. Pure Food Laboratories, Hospitals, Catholic Institutions, Hotels, Clubs, Restaurants, etc., where perfect refrigeration is demanded.

The fact that these discriminating institutions use the McCray should be satisfactory assurance that it will keep your foods fresh and healthful and prevent waste from spoilage.

FIFTY "DONT'S" OF SCIENCE

By James J. Walsh, M.D., Ph.D., is full of wise counsels for those who accept without question the dogmas of the Protestant Tradition regarding the Church's attitude toward scientific research.

CATHOLICS IN THE Y. M. C. A.

Mr. Nelson Hume shows what a grave menace that organization is to its Catholic members' faith. Several shorter papers in this number of the CATHOLIC MIND offer documentary evidence of the Y. M. C. A.'s real nature. Our latest Catholic statistics will also be found in the current issue.

Affiliated with the Catholic University of America, and the University of Kentucky
Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art
This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.
The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

CHRONICLE

The War.—In Belgium and France the engagements which have taken place have not been of such a character as to exert any immediate influence on the prospects of either side. The Belgians seem to have made some slight progress along the Yser, but the British and the French have been at a standstill. On the Lorette heights, in the Champagne district, north of Verdun, in Lorraine and Alsace there has been fighting, but it has been less sanguinary than heretofore, and has had only inappreciable results. The one success by the Allies which has an important strategic value is the capture of the top of Hartmannsweiler Kopf, in the Vosges, a position for which the French have been fighting desperately for many weeks.

Bulletin, Mar. 23, p. m.-Mar. 30, a. m.

Neither has there been any critical alteration in the state of affairs in Poland. The Russian occupation of Memel has been of brief duration, lasting only two days. The city is again in the hands of the Germans, who are exacting reprisals for the looting done by the Russians. It would appear that the bombardment of Ossowetz has failed; and that the Russians have resumed the offensive, especially in the district north of Pryzasnysz; but beyond this there is nothing of importance to record, except a general activity on the part of the Russians on all their lines.

Poland

The event which has been uppermost in every one's mind during the week has been the fall of Przemysl and its consequences. Undoubtedly it has been a very severe loss to Austria, and may lead to sweeping modifications of the situation in Galicia. While the fortress held out it was a constant menace to the Russian movements, both toward the Carpathians and in the direction of Cracow. In addition, therefore, to the fact that a Russian army of perhaps 120,000 men, together with many heavy guns, is now free to be used at other points, there is the other fact that the Russians have no longer to fear an enemy in the rear, and have greatly strengthened their hold on Galicia. The story of the siege which, with the slight interruption of several weeks, lasted six months, has given much glory to both besiegers and besieged. The Russians have displayed both courage and military prowess; while the Austrians, with their commander, have won the admiration of the world for their dogged persistence in the face of famine, disease and death. The reason for the capitulation is said to have been the immediate prospect of starvation. The siege of Przemysl will go down in history as one of the great achievements of the war.

Results of Fall of Przemysl

The immediate consequence of the capitulation of the fortress has not been, as was predicted, an advance by the Russians on Cracow, but a renewal of the attempt to cross the Carpathians and invade Hungary. Continuous fighting of a severe character has been going on ever since March 23 between Dukla and the Uzsok pass, with the Russians on the offensive. Its results are still in doubt. The Austrians state in official dispatches that the Russian attacks have "miscarried," and with heavy losses. The Russians, on the other hand, claim that they have crossed the Galician border and will soon be on the plains of Hungary. Their account of the situation is circumstantial, and states that the battle which is being fought on a front of 120 miles, in spite of large Austrian reinforcements, is altogether in favor of the Russians. According to reports from Petrograd, the Russian right wing is moving around the Austrian left toward Bart-field, in Hungary; the Russian center has got possession of the Lupkow pass with scarcely a struggle; while the Russian left, after days of terrific fighting, has forced back the Austrian right at the Uzsok pass. With regard to Bukowina there is the same uncertainty. Russia claims victories, while Austria states that the Russians have been driven beyond the frontier. This much, however, is clear, that the Austrians are maintaining their line along the river Pruth, and are still in possession of Czernowitz. In western Galicia also, and in southern Poland, the Austrians are holding firm along the rivers Dunajec and Nida.

The Carpathians

Despite many rumors of Italy's early entrance into the war, her real intentions remain as cryptic as ever. It is certain that she has made ready for that step and that her preparations are now complete. Large extensions to her hospital equipment, the accumulation of food and military supplies, the mobilization of a considerable portion of the army, the recalling of reserves from foreign countries, all of which are facts, would seem to point to her entrance into hostilities. On the other hand, the pronouncements of the Government have been interpreted to mean that Italy, while taking no chances of disaster such as might arise from a state of unreadiness, is bent on remaining neutral. Austria apparently looks on Italy's attitude with a good deal of distrust, and is also taking measures to meet any eventuality. It is reported that the ground has been cleared, trenches dug, and an army stationed at Triest. What the outcome will be, even those in Rome find it impossible to say.

Italy's Intentions

No progress has been made by the allied fleet in the Dardanelles. Operations against the forts have been of a desultory character without decisive results. The announcement, however, has been made that the attack will be resumed on a large scale as soon as preparations have been completed for a concerted movement by both land and sea. According to a report, pronounced false by the Turks, the situation in the Urumiah missions is desperate. The Turks are accused of atrocities. Already 20,000 Christians are said to be slain or missing.

Other Items

Austria-Hungary.—Referring to the desires of the Holy Father for peace, Die Information of Vienna says that the wishes of the Vatican have nowhere found a warmer response than in Austria, both on the part of the Emperor and the people. The writer considers this the more remarkable since he maintains that the success of the war has hitherto been signally on the side of Germany and the Double Monarchy, and that the future promises no less well for them. But the Vatican's call, to be effective, "must be heeded and respected by all parties." Of Austria-Hungary he declares:

Austria and the Vatican

> The Austro-Hungarian Monarchy will remain faithful to her oldest and holiest traditions if in war as in peace she gives heed to the mission and authority of the Holy See. The present Holy Father will realize, as a confirmation of an often established truth, that the Hapsburg realm is part of his strongest supports and is his indestructible stay. Ruled by a Catholic dynasty and obeying the teachings of the Church, the Monarchy keeps in view those high aims whose fulfilment implies not only the welfare of the realm and people, but likewise of the Church and the Holy See.

Germany, too, he believes, will be able to appreciate the noble intentions of the Vatican in the present supreme crisis of nations.

France.—It is announced in La Croix that the total number of ecclesiastics and Brothers who have been called to leave parishes, convents, missions, colleges and seminaries for the army is some thirty thousand. The paper then draws the following reflections:

France and Vocations

> How many of these have already fallen victims to their devotion and their heroism; how many parishes are without pastors; how many missions deprived of missionaries? Yet in the meantime, more than ever, under the spell of a religious revival, the harvest of souls is ripening and turning golden. But, alas! when the war is over, will the Father of the household have laborers enough to send for the harvesting?

It therefore calls upon the faithful to foster and make possible the development of new vocations by doing all in their power to contribute to the preparatory schools for this purpose. Some of the priests devoted to this work are at present conducting classes in Luxembourg and Belgium. What better way, asks the writer, to draw down blessings upon husbands, sons and brothers fighting at the front, than to contribute to the support of future priests and missionaries? Here doubtless will be one of the greatest questions facing Catholic France when the war has been concluded. It is wise indeed to make provision even at the present moment when other calls are so insistent.

On March 22 the court-martial of Paymaster Lieut.-Col. Desclaux, a follower of Caillaux, was begun. He was accused, together with six supposed accomplices, of stealing and selling army supplies. One of the principal figures in the trial was Mme. Bechoff, who was said to have been an accomplice and to whom food had been sent from the front by Desclaux. She claimed it was used for an ambulance and not for her house. Desclaux pleaded that he had done only what every one else was doing. He was unable to explain why he drew five francs a day for his orderly's food and also drew food and rations for the same person. On March 25 he was found guilty and was sentenced to seven years' solitary confinement and to military degradation: he was, moreover, deprived of the right to wear the Legion of Honor decoration.

Court-Martial of Lieut.-Col. Desclaux

Germany.—The event overshadowing all others in importance is the raising of the second gigantic war loan, which greatly surpasses the subscription to the first.

War Loan, Prisoners

"With two war loans totaling $3,000,000,000 we exceed England by $1,000,000,000," said Dr. von Helfferich in the Reichstag. "This proves the unbreakable financial and economic strength of Germany and the determined resolution to hold out to the end." Enormous loans have been made by business houses, corporations, labor unions and organizations of every kind. Thus the Reiffeisen Societies of the Rhineland, an institution founded for the farming population, contributed eight and a half million marks to the second loan while they had given no more than two and a half millions to the first. By March 26 the total of subscriptions had already reached 9,060,000,000 marks, without counting the contributions made by the soldiers in the field. The Emperor, writing from his army headquarters, declared himself proud to be "the first servant of such a nation." The following is in part his message:

> In the fact that the second war loan exceeds all expectations and was unparalleled in financial history, I perceive a manifestation of a will to conquer which is prepared for all sacrifices, all exertions, and a confidence of victory among the German people who are relying upon God. I extend my imperial thanks to all who contributed to this great success.

The successful raising of the first great war loan was described as equivalent to a victory. The second is spoken of by the Emperor, as "the victory of those at home." The number of prisoners in Germany just now officially announced is unprecedented. It has already risen to twice that recorded for the war of 1870 and totals 801,000 men besides 9,000 officers. The number of prisoners said to have been taken during the entire Franco-Prussian war, from 1870 to 1871, was 383,000.

Great Britain.—The determination to carry on the war to the bitter end apparently grows stronger each day. The temper of the people is shown by the way in which they met the remarks of the headmaster of Eton, who is reported to have suggested that England should give Germany a chance to save itself "from its own vindictiveness," adding that any proposal to internationalize the Kiel Canal should be accompanied by a promise to internationalize Gibraltar. In answer to angry criticism the headmaster repudiated pro-Germanism, and his secretary announced that the words about Gibraltar were an illustration, and were not to be taken literally. The Globe stigmatizes the illustration as "pernicious nonsense, of which the head of a great public school should be ashamed." The Pall Mall Gazette writes in comment:

> We can not help saying that he has done a very mischievous thing; he has joined himself with those who are, in truth, enemies unto peace. We are not going to shout "pro-German" at him or indulge in any such vulgarity. We no more doubt the purity of his patriotism than we do our own, but we are at a loss to understand his failure to realize that there is a long and stern business to be done and ineffable wrongs to be righted before we can speak of conciliation and renewed friendship with the German people. He speaks to us in the name of Christianity. Has he forgotten that Christ Himself was constrained to use the scourge of knotted cords?

The labor difficulties have made good progress toward a definite solution. The acts by which the Government was impowered to take over factories producing war materials, and others also for the purpose of converting them to the manufacture of munitions of war, have met with approval. The socialists consider the venture a vindication of one of their principles; the people at large feel that it will hasten the end of the war. These radical measures were due principally to labor difficulties which had been hindering the manufacture and transportation of army supplies. Apparently these difficulties were somewhat disconcerting. Besides addressing a branch of the Dockers' Union in vigorous language, Kitchener sent a letter to the secretary of the union, in which he said:

> I feel sure that these men hardly realize that their action in thus congesting the docks and delaying the munitions of war and food required for our men at the front is having a very serious and dangerous effect and must be stopped. . . .
> If this appeal has no effect, I shall have to consider what steps are to be taken to insure that what is required at Liverpool shall be done.

Dispatches of March 26 indicate that at first the letter did not have full effect, for 2,000 Mersey dock laborers announced that they would take the week-end holiday. This was one of the Government's objections. Dispatches of March 27 announced a better turn. The unions are acquitted of any complicity in the quarrel. The Times insists that the Clyde strike was not their fault, and praises them for their loyalty. According to report the discontent is confined to 10 per cent. of the men acting in defiance of the unions. That British trade has suffered considerably by the war is apparent from these words of the Times:

> An enormous quantity of shipping, amounting in the aggregate to many millions of tons, has been withdrawn in one way or another from the world's carrying trade. Many ships have been sunk; many more have been interned in our own, in enemy and neutral ports; and others, particularly large cargo ships, have been withdrawn for military purposes. The deficiency so produced is far too great to be made good by any means whatever.

If the press reflects popular opinion, the progress of the war is satisfactory to the people. Here and there is heard a jarring note. One paper calls for conscription; the Times lashes the Government for any lack of interest that may exist, asserting:

> They have never ceased to treat the public like whimpering children, and from the most unworthy and mistaken fears they have constantly failed to take the public into their confidence when they might have done so without the least injury to military necessities.

In general the attitude of the press toward the United States is reasonable. The "Thunderer" discusses points of differences calmly; as usual, the Spectator rises to sublime heights of self-righteousness and reads the President a lesson on his silence about the moral issues involved in the treatment of Belgium. The President is in a "perfectly hopeless position," his attitude is a "tragedy," the verdict about him will be "that of Tacitus on the Roman Emperor," and so on.

Ireland.—The panegyric of St. Patrick was preached and the rosary recited in Gaelic in most of the Dublin churches, and to a large extent throughout the country. Gaelic celebrations, in which national, religious and military organizations of all varieties combined, were held in many centers, and collections were taken up for the "Language Fund." Dr. Douglas Hyde, speaking at a great "Language Meeting" in Dundalk, said they had at length awakened the conscience of the people to the fact that the anglicization into which they were slipping spelled national extinction, and that their native language and traditions were the surest bulwark against imported irreligion and indecency and foreign inanities. The political lull occasioned by the war gave a splendid opportunity to the Gaelic League, the one All-Ireland movement which had room for every section and party. In London Mr. Redmond held a reception, at which Cardinal Bourne, after saying that the Irish leader and his colleagues did all in their power to secure adequate treatment in the matter of navy chaplains, announced that the number of Catholic chaplains appointed for war duty would soon total fourteen. A conference, at which Bishop Sheehan of Waterford represented the Irish Prelates, was determining what proportion the Catholic chaplains should bear to the 223 commissioned Protestant chaplains.

St. Patrick's Day Events

Speaking at Manchester, Mr. Redmond stated that the offer he had made to Mr. Asquith in August in behalf of the National Volunteers to undertake the defence of Ireland, had not been accepted, and that the promise made by Mr. Asquith and the Government to provide equipment and organizing facilities for the Volunteers had not been kept. He repeated the offer and urged the fulfilment of the promise, for the Ulster and the National Volunteers alike; and now that Irishmen were fighting so bravely in defence of the Empire he saw no military or constitutional reason why they should not be entrusted with the defence of their own nation. The fact that captures have been made of arms and ammunition, and people have been arrested for sedition in various parts of the country, would explain the Government's hesitancy. The withdrawal of all monies for Land Purchase, even from the Congested Districts Board, has caused much dissatisfaction.

The Government and National Volunteers

Mexico.—The country still presents a scene of "confusion worse confounded." Everything is upside down. A letter published in the New York Sun of March 28 shows that finances are in a hopeless tangle. There is no metallic money of any kind in circulation: even the copper centavos have disappeared: three factions are issuing paper currency; some of this is engraved, the rest consists of cardboard slips not unlike car tickets. Each faction as it gains control, declares the currency of the other factions counterfeit and void. Money good to-day is bad to-morrow. Thus confusion is piled on confusion. The writer says:

More Blood and Confusion

> All building operations have ceased excepting necessary repairs or those of the foreigners with more money than discretion. Large sections of the country have been either wholly or partly isolated for years, and this isolation varies like a weather-vane as the different factions pass over the country. . . . There appears nothing encouraging on the horizon, and the better class of Mexicans who still remain are so discouraged as to unite with others in crying: "How long, O Lord, how long!"

The Mexican Herald of March 3 finishes the picture this way:

> I. W. W. PARADE.
> The manifestants gathered in the Casa del Obrero Mundial, in calle de San Juan de Letram, about 7 o'clock in the evening. At the head of the parade were the leaders of the Casa del Obrero (the I. W. W.), in an automobile carrying a red flag. The automobile was escorted by several armed men. . . .
> At the corner of Bolivar and 16 de Septiembre, Rosendo Salazar, one of the leaders of the Casa del Obrero, addressed the crowd, saying, in part, that the occasion had arrived to demonstrate to the world that the Mexican laborers, conscious of their rights, have raised the red flag of social revolution against the wealthy, the clergy, those who have exploited the laborers. To defend these ideals the members of the Casa del Obrero are going to the battlefield, the speaker added.
> FRENCH REVOLUTION HELD UP.
> The oration ended by the speaker stating that now was the proper time to go into Catholic churches and demolish the statues of Christ, whom fanatics titled God of the Universe. Salazar added that Mexican workmen, following the example of the French, must start a social revolution and establish guillotines in every plaza to punish all enemies of the laboring classes. Salazar was applauded at the end of his address. . . .
> The red banners, carried at the head of the procession, had printed in black letters: "Federation of Workingmen and Employees in General of the Tramways and Light and Power Companies. Health and Social Revolution."

Under date of March 2 the same paper says with this heading, "I. W. W. Leaders Expect Total Enlistments to Reach 26,000":

> About 3,000 laborers, belonging to unions affiliated to the Casa del Obrero Mundial (local branch of the Industrial Workers of the World), have enlisted in the military corps being organized to support the Constitutionalist movement. Recruiting offices established in the building of the Casa del Obrero, in Calle de San Juan de Letran and other points here, continue recruiting laborers.
> The workmen are enlisted in conformity with the agreement recently reached in Vera Cruz between Lic. Rafael Zubaran Capmany, minister of gobernacion in General Venustiano Carranza's cabinet, and the committee representing the unions affiliated to the Casa del Obrero.

Such the Constitutionalists' cause; it is no worse than Villa's.

TOPICS OF INTEREST

The Death Penalty in America

AS I said in a preceding article in America there is a rather strong movement for the abolition of the death penalty in New York and certain other States of the Union. It is claimed, and sometimes very emphatically, that the fear of punishment by death does not restrain from crime, and frequent reference is made to the fact that when every felony was punishable by death, crime was not obliterated. Apparently it is forgotten that the execution of the law was very lax, that most people who committed these crimes escaped and that every criminal in intention thought himself one of the lucky ones who would not be punished. Under such conditions it does not matter what penalties are attached to the violation of law. Men will take the risk because nearly every one is confident of escape. The gambling spirit in man prompts him to take chances at least.

There is no need, however, to go back to the Middle Ages for experiences with capital punishment. We have them in abundance in our own time. The Civic Alliance of Massachusetts which, according to its Constitution (Art. II), has for its object "the support of civic righteousness by moral and spiritual education, and especially the securing of the defence and enforcement of good laws and the prevention, amendment or repeal of objectionable legislation," has just published a Bulletin (Vol. II, No. 1) together with a special appeal to the committee on Judiciary of the New York Legislature with regard to this subject. As the discussion of the death penalty and its possible abolition is likely to come up in other parts of this country besides New York, where it is still before the Legislature, and as many Catholics will desire to know some of the facts in the matter, so as to be able to cite them for the benefit of sentimentalists who make exaggerated claims as to the benefit of mercy for hardened criminals and the injustice of punishment of nearly all kinds, it is well worth while to have some data of the Massachusetts Alliance at hand.

To go no farther than New England, that portion of the country seems to present a very striking illustration of the significance of capital punishment and of the danger of abolishing it. Maine and Rhode Island, two rather widely separated States within the province, whose populations are not in any way different from those of the other New England States, abolished capital punishment a generation ago, substituting life imprisonment in its stead. From 1900 to 1910 there were fifty-six murders in these two States, while in the three States of Connecticut, Vermont and Massachusetts during the same period there were thirty-six murders in a population four times greater than the population of Rhode Island and Maine. That is to say, one and a half as many murders occurred in a population one-fourth the size, the death penalty not existing where the high murder rate obtained. Sentimental Rhode Island found that it was entirely too dangerous to have the death penalty completely abolished, so it was restored for such as commit murder in an attempt to break out of prison. This was a confession of the deterrent effect of the death penalty, and was, of course, meant as a protection for the keepers of men already under sentence of life imprisonment for murder.

A number of the Western States have experimented with the abolition of the death penalty in such a way that one of our American statesmen once said that we might very well permit them to experiment on the body politic and reap advantage from the knowledge thus secured. Iowa abolished the death penalty in 1872, and the number of murders increased to such an alarming extent that four years later the death penalty was restored. Michigan abolished the death penalty some forty years ago, and notwithstanding the well-directed efforts of conservatives, it has been impossible to put the law for capital punishment on the statute books again, though there has been an increase in the number of murders of 2,500 per cent. In Colorado the death penalty was abrogated in 1899, and the result was a great increase in the number of murders. Finally, the people took the law into their own hands and an appeal to lynch law was made in certain cases. In one instance a murderer was burned at the stake after oil had been poured over his body and the match applied by the father of the murdered girl. The horrified people of the State reenacted the death penalty after three years of abeyance and are now satisfied to have the old law.

Still more recently, in 1913, the State of Washington, the great experimenter in governmental processes, repealed the capital punishment law. The result proved very unsatisfactory, however, and in the present month, March, 1915, a new bill to restore the death penalty has passed the Senate with a large majority, and is to be enacted into law.

Unfortunately in many places where the death penalty is on the statute books, the administration of law is so lax that most of its effect is lost. The difference in this regard between England and the United States is very striking, and as a consequence the contrast of the statistics of murders in the two countries is very great. In Chicago during last year (1914) there were 262 murders in a population of less than two million and a half, while in London there were only thirty-six murders in a population of over seven millions and a quarter. More than seven times as many murders occurred in a population less than one-third as great. The number of robberies and assaults involving danger of death in the two cities in the same year is, if possible, more striking. The number of such felonies in Chicago during 1914 was 1,022, while in London it was only 78. This is not because the criminal classes are less numerous in London, for the number of burglaries—in the perpetration of which there is less likelihood of murder—is about the same in both cities. The death penalty evidently has a great deterrent effect in England because it is promptly put into literal execution.

The contrast between Italy and England is amazing. Italy has had no capital punishment for over thirty years, but only solitary confinement, which is surely an awful thing to contemplate. In 1905 the number of homicides in Italy was 105 per million of population; in England in the same year the number of homicides was 27 per million.

On the question of the humanity of capital punishment the Bulletin of the Massachusetts Civic Alliance for February, 1915, says that the enemies of capital punishment are proclaiming that the death penalty is founded on vengeance. The Bulletin reminds them, however, that this objection was answered many years ago by the great jurist, Daniel Webster, who, in one of his speeches declared, "The criminal law is not founded on a principle of vengeance. It does not punish that it may inflict suffering. The humanity of law feels and regrets every pain it causes, every hour of restraint it imposes, and more deeply still every life it forfeits. It seeks to deter from crime by the example of punishment. . . . It restrains the liberty of the few offenders, that the many who do not offend may enjoy their own liberty. It forfeits the life of the murderer, that other murders may not be committed. . . . When the guilty, therefore, are not punished the law so far fails of its purpose; the safety of the innocent is so far endangered."

As we suggested in the last article in AMERICA a great deal of the sentimentality that finds it so hard to punish criminals by death is due to the decrease of belief in immortality. To take a man's life if there is no hereafter is indeed a serious thing; it is annihilation; but if the taking of life gives him an opportunity to begin another existence properly, then it is but a passing incident. It is indeed hard to understand that while war with its harvest of death is a duty, the taking of human life nobly and with dignity as a punishment, for its deterrent effects, should seem inhuman.

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D.

Chasing Rainbows

A CATHOLIC daily is highly desirable. No one questions that. A well edited, live metropolitan newspaper with wide circulation: a militant journal, ready to conduct a crusade when a crusade is necessary, prepared to denounce when evil men or measures appear; a paper without political or financial entanglements that would crystallize Catholic sentiment and aid in every good work, surely this is a goal worth striving for. But is it feasible, is such a paper possible under present conditions? That is the question.

To begin with, newspapers cost money. The New York World, morning and evening editions, was appraised at $3,016,455 after the death of Joseph Pulitzer, while the Sun was valued at $2,415,000 in 1912. It is understood that Frank A. Munsey paid $1,000,000 when he bought the New York Press about two years ago. A newspaper's expenses are very heavy; its income is derived very largely from advertising. Unlike many other enterprises it can not have small beginnings, but must start with a full force and be prepared to stand financial stress until circulation figures convince advertisers. It is impossible to set any accurate amount for the yearly cost of a newspaper. However, here are some figures, furnished by a newspaper executive, for an average sized metropolitan paper of 100,000 or more, daily circulation. White paper, $500,000; city news department, $150,000; cable news department, $50,000; typesetting, $150,000; press work and stereotyping, $100,000; supplies, $50,000; circulation department, $150,000; executive heads, $75,000; art department, $60,000; business office, $50,000—totaling more than $1,500,000. According to a man formerly connected with the New York Herald's management, that paper's yearly expenses are approximately $3,000,000.

A Catholic daily would probably cost less than half that amount. The only certain source of income would be the price paid by the reader for the paper, and this would just about pay for the white paper. To start a daily in New York would take, in cash or credit, about $1,000,000 to buy the plant and as much more to assure the journal's continuance for a year.

Could such a sum be raised in the face of the ordinary needs of the Church and the exceptional demands of war time? Could it be secured without shackling the paper to some particular interest even in normal times? But, suppose the money was secured from an individual or syndicate and the paper could start with untrammeled management, what manner of publication should our Catholic daily be? There are several systems of journalism. Some publishers proceed upon the principle: "What God allows to happen I am willing to print." They hold that a newspaper should be a picture of life, showing its lights and shadows. Others believe that a newspaper should feature only those events that are ennobling and uplifting, suppressing or minimizing the others. If the newspaper were of the former sort, publishing murders, suicides, divorce cases, and so on, would it receive the support of the hierarchy? If the paper were of the latter sort, would the people buy it?

Now comes the crux of the whole situation. When one deals with the "Catholic public" he deals with a great conglomerate mass of humanity united by no social, racial or business ties and bound together only by the bond of religion; a multitude of cliques and circles and antagonistic nationalities. Catholics are not a class, not a social stratum, just "the people." How would a paper appeal to them?

One much-criticized newspaper sets out to appeal to this public. Its circulation is about 800,000 copies a day. Another New York afternoon paper selects its news and rigidly excludes the sensational. Its circulation is less than 26,000. Of course, there is a middle ground, but these figures show what sort of a paper is interesting to the multitudes who should be reached by a Catholic daily. Nor will Catholics pay for any publication that does not interest them. Could a Catholic daily decorously be the kind of a paper its public likes to read?

Then comes politics. The horns of this dilemma are too apparent to need exposition.

Ordinarily the Catholic daily would have little to distinguish it in appearance from any other newspaper. Why? Because there would be only occasional need for crusades or exposures and there is very little real Catholic news. Every New York paper is anxious to print Catholic news, but the Church goes on her way with few changes and little commotion, while news generally means change or trouble. So the Catholic daily would directly compete with every other paper. It must be as newsy, as full of pictures, as sensational, in a sense, as the best—or worst, it is a matter of opinion—to hold its circulation. After all, the problem resolves itself, not into questions of sentiment or desirability, but into a practical business situation. This test must lead one, albeit reluctant, to but a single conclusion. A metropolitan Catholic daily under present conditions is utterly impracticable.

Then must all the enthusiasm, all the energy of those who have worked and thought on this matter be wasted? Not at all. Catholic criticism has an unfortunate tendency to be destructive rather than constructive. Why not try a new attitude? In every city there might be an active, energetic executive committee composed of the presidents of men's organizations—and women's, too, in States where women vote—that could speak and act authoritatively in matters where Catholics are concerned. From the city and town committees, county and State bodies could be drawn, alert groups with funds at their disposal. A trifling assessment would guarantee more than enough money. Instead of a Catholic daily, a Catholic vigilance committee. The papers would print all the news furnished as soon as the committee demonstrated that it really represented Catholic opinion.

Mendel Beilis is put on trial in a corner of Russia on a charge of ritual murder; protests go up from every part of the civilized world. Leo Frank, an obscure boy in the South, protests that he is persecuted for his race and religion; newspapers from California to Maine print pages about it.

In the meantime, while Catholics are picking each other to pieces and chasing rainbows, one State has passed a prohibition law that excludes even altar wines; then there is Mexico, not to mention the Menace. Nobody pays much attention, not because the press is antagonistic, but because there seems to be no organization that will impressively and persistently present the Catholic side.

While Catholics can not hope for racial cohesiveness, solidarity is possible. All the elements for it are at hand; one-twentieth of the money required to start a newspaper would finance it. This is what is needed. And who knows but that an aroused Catholic sentiment might germinate a newspaper or vitalize an existing publication?

Horace Foster.

Catholics' "Divided Allegiance"

ONE of the common objections made against the Catholic Church is that its members can not be loyal to their native land, the reason being the fact that they have a twofold allegiance, to their country and to the Church. A thousand times has this charge been proved to be false and groundless, both in theory and in practice. Cold, logical pages, blood-stained battle-fields, Iron Crosses, Victoria Crosses, Crosses of the Legion of Honor—all have demonstrated that the very contrary is true. Nevertheless the fiction has been repeated so often that in many minds it passes for fact; mud has been thrown so assiduously that some of it has stuck. The consequence is that well-meaning inquirers into the claims of the Church find themselves troubled and bewildered. Allegiance to the Pope of Rome looms up like some greedy monster that will demand such devotion for himself that there will be no room left for devotion to one's native land. The fighting lines in Europe are perhaps at the present moment the best possible refutation of this persistent myth. The Catholic death rolls give the lie direct to the old calumny. For those, however, who live in the United States there is a retort courteous of peculiar local force.

Of practically all the peoples of the world, our fellow-citizens have least reason to find a difficulty in our double allegiance to our country and to the Pope. They themselves are practising and professing a similar double allegiance every day of their lives, and are by no means at a loss to reconcile the twofold claims. How our non-Catholic friends would smile at our ignorance if we said that allegiance to their own particular State in any way interferes with their allegiance to the Federal Government at Washington!

The best Constitutional lawyers are at one in declaring that each of the forty-eight States is sovereign, supreme and absolute, and clothed with full authority within its own jurisdiction. Our Government does not consist of one State divided into forty-eight parts, but rather of forty-eight different States which in the matter of certain rights coalesce into one, with the purpose of having better provision made both for general rights and also for their own particular rights. All citizens, therefore, of the American Commonwealth have two distinct allegiances, namely, the one to the General Government, and the other to the Government of their own State. It is undeniable that Americans look to the Federal Government as the principal object of their loyalty, but those who are informed are all the time aware that their subjection to the authority at Washington is restricted to a certain field, limited and marked out clearly by the Constitution.

Now this twofold subjection on the part of the citizen to State authority and to Federal authority presents a rather striking parallel to the Catholic's subjection to the authority of his native land and to the authority of the Church. In both cases the individual is a member of two societies, each distinct from the other, each possessed of its own independent legislative, executive and coercive power. Each derives its authority from God and imposes duties binding in conscience.

The parallel, of course, does not hold in all details. In the one case the authority is restricted to things that are merely temporal and civil and has no direct relation to things that are supernatural; in the other case the authority has for its end the supernatural interests of the individual and does not extend to what is purely temporal and civil; if it touches temporal and civil things at all it does so only when they have such an intimate connection with the end of the Church that they are either forbidden or commanded by the divine or natural law. This divergence, however, does not change the fact that in both cases there is a double allegiance, which is quite in accord with reason, and quite compatible with due subjection and whole-hearted loyalty to each separate authority.

The Catholic is no more hampered in his loyalty to his native land by his subjection to Rome than the citizen of New York is hampered in his loyalty to the State Government at Albany by his subjection to Washington. The spheres of civil and papal jurisdiction no more conflict than do the spheres of State and Federal jurisdiction. If at any time irreconcilable claims should arise, in one case no less than in the other the higher authority prevails. Such opposition, however, is not likely to occur, because the two authorities move in different planes. Indeed, there is much less probability of a clash taking place between the rights of Rome and the rights of Washington, than between the rights of Albany and the rights of Washington. The reason is clear. Roman authority extends only to matters that intimately concern faith and morals, about which secular authority has little, if any, concern; whereas both Albany and Washington deal with temporal and civil matters.

So far, indeed, is it from being a fact that loyalty to the Church interferes with obedience to the State, that the very contrary is true. Civil authority finds its strongest and most zealous ally in the authority of the Church. For whereas the modern State, in its enactments does not, as a rule, even pretend to impose any obligation in conscience, the Church goes much further, and imposes on all Catholics in the matter of lawful State commands that are not merely penal, an obligation in conscience, a duty that binds under pain of sin. She vindicates for the State the sublime function of voicing the will of God, and the consequent right of exacting, as a strict moral obligation, submission and obedience in all things where there is no sin.

Nor does she leave her children in doubt as to the line of demarcation between her authority and that of the State. St. Thomas is only expressing her common teaching when he says (II Sent. D. 44, q. 2, a. 3, ad. 4): ". . . in matters that concern the salvation of the soul . . . the spiritual authority is to be obeyed rather than the secular. But in matters that concern the good of the State the secular authority is to be obeyed rather than the spiritual, according to St. Matthew xxii, 21." It is a striking fact, therefore, that the Church is more concerned for obedience to the State than the State is for herself. The State has always been jealous of ecclesiastical authority, the Church has never been jealous of the civil. If she has ever been jealous with regard to the State, it has been with a jealousy that was for and not against State rights. She has constantly menaced her children with the divine displeasure and her own, if they did not yield to their secular rulers the full measure of obedience to all lawful commands. Strange as it may seem, this has been her attitude from the beginning: it will be her attitude to the end.

Our First Constitutional Assembly

THE Constitutional Convention, which will assemble in Albany on April 6, is of supreme importance to every citizen of our great State. It is a constitutional means adopted to safeguard and reinforce the priceless heritage of liberties which are our protection and our glory. On the eve of this Convention, a study of the origin of our individual, civil and religious liberties will prove of interest and value. This study carries us back to the first Constitutional Convention and the first legislative assembly convened in the Province of New York. Its presiding officer and controlling genius was the Catholic, Thomas Dongan, Governor of the Province—a ruler who, for breadth of mind, wide sympathy and executive ability, stands far in advance of his times, and, measured by the system of government which he inaugurated, is one of the most attractive personages in American history.

By virtue of writs issued by Dongan, twenty-eight representatives from different parts of the Province met in Fort James on Manhattan Island, October 14, 1683. The session lasted three weeks. Fifteen Acts were passed. The most important were: "An Act entitled the Charter of Liberties"; "An Act to Divide this Province into Shires and Counties"; "An Act for the Naturalization of Foreigners"; "An Act to Settle Courts of Justice." After three readings each was approved by the Governor. Any one of these enactments would have made this assembly memorable in the civil history of New York. Together they reveal a deep appreciation of popular rights and consolidated the Province on a broad, sound basis of constitutional government. And these truths expressed in lofty, clear and eloquent language give to this assembly a leading position in the history of American institutions, so that they may be justly called the Magna Charta of American liberty, breathing a spirit and outlining a program which developed nearly one hundred years after into the Declaration of Independence. An analysis of some of the Assembly's enactments will make this clear:

(1) For the better establishing the Government of the Province of New York, and that justice and right may be equally done to all persons within the same,

Be it enacted that the supreme Legislative Authority under the Duke of York, the Lord Proprietor, shall forever be and reside in a Governour, Council and the people met in General Assembly.

In this province, for the first time in American history, was asserted the right of the people to share in their own government, a right which is the foundation of our political liberties. For this reason on March 31, 1685, the Board of Trade and Plantations vetoed the charter. Nevertheless the same words are incorporated by Governor Sloughter (1691) in the Bill of Rights, which is a word for word repetition of the Charter of Liberties, with the exception of the first and last paragraphs. In 1694 King William vetoed the Bill stating that it was not fitting for a subordinate assembly to declare what are its rights. While the vetoes may have had a technical legal value, they were never regarded by the people and the assemblies of the Province, as having any effect.

(2) That the exercise of the chief magistracy and administration of the Government shall be in the Governour assisted by a Council.

By this enactment the powers of the executive are outlined and distinguished from the legislative function. For after specifying the counties and the number of representatives to which each was entitled in subsequent assemblies, the charter states "that all bills agreed upon by the said representatives or the major part of them shall be presented unto the Governor and his council for their approbation and consent." All bills "so approved shall be esteemed the laws of the Province," until "they shall be repealed by the authority aforesaid i. e. the Governor, council and assembly, with the approbation of His Royal Highness, or expire by their own limitations."

Thus as the King of England had the right of legislation in conjunction with the Houses of Parliament, so the Governor is empowered to make laws with the consent of the council and the assembly. The great principle here expressed is the separation and mutual independence of the executive and the legislature. The idea though new in America, yet was an element of the English constitution fought for in the Petition of Right and in full operation under the Restoration. The Governor had a part in legislation by the power of veto and by acting with the cooperation of the council and the assembly. The assembly could not override the Governor's veto but could refuse to pass laws and thus block legislation. Notable instances of such action are had in the conduct of the assembly toward Governor Hunter in 1705 and Governor Clinton in 1741.

By the provision in the charter that the Governor should pass laws with the consent of the council, the legislative power had three vetoes. Not only the Governor and the assembly, but the council also had the power to stop legislation. The result was that the council was constituted a separate branch of the legislature. Thus in 1729 the Board of Trade directed Governor Cosby not to act as a member of the legislative council. Nearly fifty years before the War of Independence, the separation of the executive and the legislative functions in New York Province was complete and the legislature was made up of two distinct houses, the Council and Assembly. The principle was enunciated by Dongan and is so sound that it is the controlling idea of our own State and Federal Governments. Place the senate instead of the council and an elected governor instead of an appointed one, and New York State to-day is governed by the Charter of Liberties of 1683, with one addition only, namely, the power of the legislature to pass a measure over the Governor's veto by a two-third vote.

In regard to the character and privileges of the representatives, the Charter enacts that (3) "the said representatives may appoint their own time of meeting during their session and may adjourn the house from time to time," that they are "the sole judges of the qualifications of their own members, and likewise of all due elections, and may from time to time purge their house as they shall see occasion during the same session," that they "shall not be imprisoned or any ways molested" during the said session or whilst going or returning, "cases of high treason and felony only excepted."

By this provision the members of the assembly were granted the same rights and privileges accorded to the members of the British Parliament. This marks an innovation in American Colonial government. As late as 1669 the Assembly of Maryland was declared to be not like the House of Commons as to the rights and privileges of its members, but like the Common Council of London, and the members unlike the New York Assembly tamely submitted to this distinction. The supremacy of the people in matters of legislation through their representatives is specified by the words of the Charter on the subject of taxation:

No aid, tax, assessment, custom, loan, benevolence or imposition whatsoever, shall be made, assessed, imposed or levied within this province or their estates, under any manner of color or pretense, but by the act or consent of the Governour, Council and Representatives in General Assembly met and assembled.

Nearly one hundred years before the War of Independence the principle: "No taxation without representation," and the denial of the right of Parliament to tax the colony were solemnly made the law of the land. These enactments mark a startling innovation. In the "Frame of Government," drawn up by Pennsylvania, 1682, the right of Parliament to tax the colony is stated expressly. The principle of parliamentary supremacy—the only heritage left by Cromwell—was thus explicitly denied by Dongan, and its insistence by English rulers ultimately led to our independence as a nation.

Not only did Dongan separate the executive from the legislative function, he also provided for the independence of the judiciary. The Charter enacts the establishment of town and county courts, and for the Court of Oyer and Terminer, changed at the last Constitutional Convention, 1894, to the present Supreme Court. Trial by jury was established, the equality of citizens before the law was proclaimed and individual and civil liberties safeguarded. Finally in clear and ringing words the Charter proclaims the priceless right of religious liberty.

By enacting this form of government in the Assembly of 1683, Dongan lifted the Province from a voiceless dependency on the English crown to a constituency conscious of its power and determined to use it. He made the assembly a body coequal to and independent of the English Parliament. He formulated an English colonial policy far in advance of his time. He is the originator of the imperial idea. As a result of the wise legislation laid down and carried into effect by other colonial assemblies of New York, the transition from the government of the Province to the government of the State at the time of the War of Independence was easily and naturally brought about. The organic constitution remained the same, the changes were very few and were made for the new situation which confronted the Province after the peace of 1783. When English statesmen realized the mistake made, they took the constitution of Dongan for their colonies. To-day Canada, Australia and the Transvaal are governed on the lines laid down by the New York Assembly of 1683. Thus Dongan enunciated principles of government which on the one hand have developed into our own great commonwealth, and on the other have made England the greatest colonial power in history.

In the history of a people, a convention like that of 1683 could assemble but once. It holds all that we glory in and enjoy as a sovereign State and a free people. In its light and with its spirit the coming Constitutional Convention will assemble. The purpose is not to enact anything new, in the sense that it will be a departure from the priceless heritage acquired through the action of a Catholic Governor, but to provide safeguards that the principles of individual civil and religious liberty so clearly laid down and marvelously framed into an organic whole by the first Constitutional Convention shall be preserved and shall hold sway in undiminished power and freedom.

The Liturgy of Easter

BACK, far back, to the early days of the Church do the ceremonies of Holy Saturday carry us. To the time when the season of Lent was shortened to but a few days, and the first Mass of Easter was celebrated in the hours of darkness. The language of the ceremonies speaks of night, and the deacon, when he mounts the ambo to bless the Paschal candle, chants of the night:

> This is the night wherein our fathers, the children of Israel, were led forth from Egypt, and passed dry-shod through the Red Sea. This is that night which, by a pillar of light, purged the darkness of sin. . . . This is the night in which the chains of death were shattered, and Christ rose victorious from Hell. . . .

And the great pillar of wax is set up, crowned with a golden flame, as in the days when the faithful watched throughout the night until the lighting of the lamps foretokened the approaching dawn of the Resurrection.

As the watchers kept their vigil, and as the service of Holy Saturday proceeds, there begins a long journey through the centuries, a search to find the types which shadowed forth the Mystery of Easter morning. Far back to the misty recesses of antiquity, when Adam walked through the Garden of Eden, through the darkness of the days of Noë, companying with Abraham on the mountain of sacrifice, when he hesitated not to bind his only son on the altar until the voice of the angel stayed the hand that held the uplifted knife. The Red Sea is passed dry-shod, and in the distance thunders the rush of hoofs as the horsemen and chariots of Egypt press to their doom in the path of the sea. Through forty long years in the wilderness of Sinai, down through the Valley of Dry Bones with Ezechiel, and at last to the barbaric splendor of the court of Nabuchodonosor, to the heat of the fiery furnace, in the midst of which walked the Three Children, while with them walked one like to the Son of God.

The types and the shadows fulfil their part; and the witnesses of the new law usher in the dawn of the Gospel, as the watchers chant the Church's litany of her canonized saints. Again there is a long-drawn cry for mercy: Kyrie eleison, Christe eleison, Kyrie eleison, and from the organ there bursts a crash of melody and the bells peal out as the Gloria in excelsis is chanted. Penitential vestments are now laid aside, and the garments of joy put on; and at last, when the three-fold Alleluia echoes throughout the church, then is the joyful anticipation of Easter complete. The spell of Lent is broken, and the eternal spring-tide has once again come to give joy to the earth.

Resurrexi, et adhuc tecum sum: "I rose up and am still with thee." From the whole treasury of the Sacred Scriptures, this alone has the divine ingenuity of the Church chosen to make the whole wondering universe ring with the tidings of the Resurrection.

In the midst of all this joy that makes the morning stars sing together in their courses, and the pillars of the earth to pulsate with the heavenly mirth of the spheres, solemn, sad-eyed skepticism wraps itself about with the wintry gloom that settled on a forlorn pagan world, and mumbles, as with the halting speech of toothless crones, of the goddess Eostre. Or else, blinking through the fogs that obscure its vision, it peers in a hopeless quest to light upon some remote spot in the past where haply its fading sight may be refreshed by a mirage of the myth of the sun-god Mithra: and deafened it can not hear, pealing through the centuries, the unquenchable voice of St. John Damascene:

> 'Tis the Spring of souls to-day;
> Christ hath burst His prison,
> And from three days' sleep in death
> As a sun hath risen.

Contrasted with this unhappy solemnity of the skeptic is the happy mirth of the Church on this festum festorum. "I rose up and am still with thee, Alleluia; thou hast laid thy hand upon me, Alleluia, Alleluia; thy knowledge has become wonderful to me, Alleluia, Alleluia, Alleluia." The smile that nature wears in the spring sunshine falls short of the almost uncontainable sense of joyous happiness which is ours in the Church's liturgy for Easter. The dread night of the Passover, which led the ancient chosen people out into the night, out through darkness to freedom, gives place to the happy dawning which has come with the Resurrection. "Purge out the old leaven, that you may be a new paste, as you are unleavened. For Christ our pasch is sacrificed. Therefore, let us feast, not with the old leaven, nor with the leaven of malice and wickedness: but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth. (I Cor. v, 1, 8.)

The Gradual of Easter Day is distinct from almost every other Gradual sung throughout the year. The words, taken from the Psalm: "This is the day which the Lord hath made: let us be glad and rejoice therein," are in themselves appropriate to the day. But in the chant there is a note as of singing for the sheer joy of singing, and the long-drawn jubilæ prolong the sacred chant as the song of the bird is prolonged and flung up to the heavens above. To the Gradual and Alleluia follows the Sequence, one of the few remaining in the liturgy, a legacy from Wipo in eleventh century Burgundy:

> To the Paschal Victim, Christians,
> Offer ye grateful praises.
> A Lamb the sheep hath ransom'd:
> Christ, the holy and harmless,
> Reconcileth sinners with the Father.
> Death and Life for the mast'ry
> Met in wond'rous encounter;
> The Prince of life, who died, ever liveth.
> Tell, Maries, pray, tell ye,
> What in the way befell ye?
> "I saw the Lord's three-day prison
> Whence Jesus in triumph had arisen.
> "Two angels by-standing,
> The cloth and linen-banding.
> "He's risen, my Hope and Glory;
> To Galilee He go'th before ye."
> Christ, we know, indeed is risen
> From death's gloomy portal:
> Have mercy, Victor-monarch immortal.

Stately and solemn, like the dance of the angels which the Blessed Angelico saw and painted, is the Gospel for Easter, on which the choir office for the day is founded. "The Angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and rolled back the stone, and sat upon it. Alleluia, Alleluia. . . . His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white like snow. Alleluia, Alleluia. . . . And for fear of him the guards were terrified, and became like dead men. Alleluia. . . ." The same thought is contained in the Offertory. "The earth trembled and was still, when God arose in judgment. Alleluia." So in her liturgy, in the sacred ceremonies and chant of Easter, the Church sets forth, as perfectly as human symbols can shadow the divine realities lying behind them, the holy joy that came into the world through the Resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

Rejoice, ye heav'ns, and all therein,
And set the earth example:
God's mighty arm hath conquered sin;
His death on Death doth trample:
The first-begotten of the dead,
From hell's dark womb ascending,
The Saviour of the world, our Head,
Hath store of grace unbending,
To whom be glory! Amen.

Henry C. Watts.

Paris in War Time

IN a paper published in America six months ago, the "sobered" attitude of Paris at the beginning of the war was noted; eight months have now passed by since the call to arms made every Frenchman, between twenty and forty-five years of age, a soldier and, under somewhat different circumstances, Paris retains its aspect of dignified calmness.

The city is not empty, as it was in August and September, when the German armies were almost within sight; its people have returned; the schools and colleges have reopened, not without difficulty, many teachers having exchanged their books for the rifle. The big shops are, happily for the women they employ, carrying on their trade. Hampered at every turn, they endeavor, as far as circumstances will permit, to satisfy their clients. Only in the most fashionable quarters, the smartest dressmakers, tailors and jewelers that, in old days, were even more largely patronized by strangers than by the Parisians of Paris, keep their doors closed. There is no place in the Paris of to-day for superfluous finery and money is needed for more tragic purposes.

The better side of Paris was, in the past, ignored by many of its visitors, who easily expatiated on the frivolity and immorality of the French capital, without taking the trouble to discover if, below the show and froth, there was not an undercurrent of higher purposes and nobler aims. Now, this better side that our visitors had neither time nor inclination to examine, strikes even the casual observer.

The necessities and the suffering of the great war have called forth the latent generosity of the Parisians. It must be remembered that, although other nations engaged in the war have to endure pain and loss, France, in addition, has had thousands of helpless refugees from the northern provinces, now in German hands, thrown upon the charity of those whose homes are still standing. To these and other claims upon her pity, Paris has nobly responded. The three Societies of the French Red Cross, which have founded 1,561 hospitals for wounded soldiers throughout France, provide for three hundred hospitals in Paris alone. In addition to these, the British, Japanese and American Red Cross have hospitals that are perfectly appointed; indeed, the American ambulance at Neuilly is perhaps the most luxurious of the three.

But the wounded soldiers are not the only objects of compassion, though they appeal in a very special manner to the sympathy of the people. In many homes, the bread-winner is at the front and the Comité du secours national gives a regular stipend to the wives and children who are left at home. The Cardinal Archbishop of Paris figures with the leading public men on the committee and, after some confusion at the start, the organization has fallen into shape and works regularly. Other charitable associations, the conferences of St. Vincent de Paul among others, distribute cooked food to families, who need it and, in the big buildings of the former seminary of St. Sulpice, are sheltered the unfortunate refugees from the northern provinces. The first friends of these hapless fugitives were the policemen of the quarter, who generously gave up 25 per cent. of their pay to befriend their countrymen. Other benefactors followed, and the homeless ones, who are chiefly women and children, have now the strict necessaries of life, but alas no more! Another institution, born of the war, are the ateliers or work-meetings for young girls, whom the war has thrown out of employment. There are over five hundred of these ateliers in Paris at the present moment and those who have spent some days in company of these busy workers are qualified to praise the courage, patience and generosity of the Parisienne in time of war.

While women, bearing the greatest names of France, work day and night in the Red Cross hospitals, their humbler sisters knit and stitch. France has become a vast workshop; in the tram cars, in the trains, at home and abroad, the French woman of 1915 plies her needle unceasingly. She works for the soldiers, for the prisoners, for the refugees; fancy work is a thing of the past, good, solid, practical sewing or knitting is the order of the day.

The tragic aspects of the war are brought home to us at every turn by the number of women in deep mourning who are to be met with. They crowd the churches, where they learn to bear losses that, in many cases, overshadow more than one life, but their sorrow is unselfish and it pours itself out on others with marvelous generosity. It would seem as if these bereaved women had received from their loved ones the message that an only child, killed in the Argonne, sent to his mother: "I know that in losing me, you lose all your earthly happiness, but I beg of you to find comfort in helping others."

Brave, uncomplaining and generous is the Paris of to-day. Those who may have misjudged its people in the past, would, at the present moment, do them justice. The seeds of the religious revival were sown before the war, as those who see France from within can testify, but the perils and hardships of the great struggle have fanned the flame that was kindled by humble laborers, in the teeth of official opposition, during the last fifteen years.

Catholics abroad will tell us that our Government's attitude in religious matters has not been modified by the war; this is true, we admit the fact and we regret it but we, who live in France, know that her politicians do not, at the present moment, represent the real soul of the native. That soul is on the line of fire where our soldiers fight and our soldier-priests evangelize their comrades; it is also in the homes where our women, noble and plebeian, suffer, work and pray. When the war is over, the men who now represent the souls of the people, may have other tasks to accomplish at home. At the present crisis, while deploring the attitude of our politicians, the absence of an official representative at Rome and occasional injustices prompted by sectarianism, we recognize that these things must be dealt with later. At a moment when all the energies of the people are bent on the pressing duty in hand, we are content, gladly and gratefully, to recognize the advent of a new and better France, purified and elevated by pain.

B. de Courson.

A Happy Failure

THE "Grand Orient" in its diabolic zeal, and with the impulse to strike while the iron is hot, has ventured too far in its attempt to stir up insubordination among French Catholics, and thus tear them away, if possible, from their loyalty to the Holy Father, thereby creating a "Gallican Church" similar to the "Anglican Church," and subject to the French Government. There seemed, a month ago, some chance to awaken sedition in minds strained almost to frenzy by race hatred.

Since that time many ecclesiastics of the Church in France as well as prominent laymen have come to Rome, and have seen the Holy Father. They have been obliged to recognize the firm and unswerving impartiality, which is the attitude, not of one man nor of one period, but is the position of the Church and of her Divine Master who ordained that the Gospel should be preached to all nations, that His Church might be universal; and who promised to be with her "all days even to the consummation of the world." A month ago, in France, the Holy Father's prayer for peace was confiscated by the French Government, until it was explained by Cardinal Amette as "meaning" to pray, not for peace alone, but for the victory of the Allies! Catholics were then permitted to repeat in the churches the Holy Father's beautiful prayer, which asks only for the Peace of God—that His will be done!

The anti-Christian Government selected this date, February 7th, to be also the "Feast of the Cannon of 75." "Medals" of this quick-firing instrument of carnage were sold in front of all the churches of Paris on that day, and worn by the congregation, while they knelt at prayer; beseeching peace from the merciful and Sacred Heart of Love for all mankind. That was a moment when the iron was hot; and the atheist Government struck its blow. The gates of hell seemed to shake the rock in France. It quivered with the shock. Here at the center, the Holy Father was besieged with warnings which were almost threats—that "the faith" was weakening in France, and there might be a direful falling away from the Church, if the Pope should not declare himself a political partizan! In spite of Cardinal Gasparri's repeated assertions that the Holy See must preserve an absolute neutrality, and in spite of the Holy Father's letters to Cardinal Mercier expressing the deepest sympathy for the suffering of Belgium, and horror at the cruelties of war—Catholics in France, in Belgium and in England continued to exclaim: "This is not enough, the Pope must go further!"

As a matter of course every anti-Catholic influence among the Allies seized upon this state of semi-insubordination, and tried to twist it into a hostile force which would swell the ranks of anti-clericalism.

It was at this moment, about three weeks ago, that the really Catholic element in France began to realize the danger and to measure the width and the depth of the abyss toward which the Grand Orient was bent upon dragging the Catholic Church in France in the hope of seeing it hurled over the edge, and lie broken and supine in the darkness, as the "French Church"—with altars desolate.

This revulsion began, as I have already said, about three weeks ago, when Mgr. Odelin, Vicar-General of Paris, after a visit to Rome, declared in an interview printed in a Paris paper: "One must not judge these affairs in Paris. Considered from the angle of the Eternal City, facts assume an aspect quite comprehensible." On the 18th of February, Mgr. Chapon, Bishop of Nice, on his return from Rome, gave an interview to the Eclaireur de Nice in which he explains the attitude of the Holy Father, declaring that the Pope has expressed all the personal sympathy that could be expected, and that his attitude as Sovereign Pontiff must be impartial.

The Roman organ of Freemasonry took up this interview and with its accustomed sneer, said that an anonymous "reader" had protested in the Eclaireur de Nice against the bishop's explanation and quotes from his communication some "edifying" sentences of which this is an example: "The Pope has preferred to preserve a half-silence, confining himself to general reproofs, which have to be squeezed, like fruit, to extract any juice; and this, for fear of Germany!"

The Paris edition of the New York Herald, another anti-Catholic organ, in an effort to help, exclaims: "When peace is made, the French priests who have seen their brothers massacred, will observe with surprise that the Head of the Church has not uttered a single word of pity for them, and this will be the dawn of a new Gallicanism, which will correspond to a small schism!"

The French clergy have been aroused to a realization of this danger. All the discourses given in Lent are warning the people to be loyal to their Church, and at Notre Dame the Chanoine Lenfant, curé of Saint Antoine, has carefully explained to his hearers the attitude of the Holy Father, remarking signficantly: "In short, those who blame the impartial position of the Pope are either the authors or the accomplices of an anti-clerical movement, and are disturbing the sacred unity of the Church." Let us hope then that for the present this scheme of the enemy has failed, but the Catholics of France are forewarned, and should be forearmed for the future. After the present political war is over, there will surely come the most deadly struggle for existence that the Church has ever known even in France.

French Catholics have submitted for twenty years to the most outrageous persecution. The foes of the Church still live, their hatred is manifest in every country of Europe. If, in France, during the battles that are raging, the serpent seems dormant, glutted with the spoils of exiled religious Orders, stolen churches and évéchés, and is now utilizing to the last drop of blood the patriotism of the faithful, their love for the France of glorious fame and a triumphant Church, the day of awakening will surely come, when the war is over; and we may hope and pray that the Catholics of France, reunited as they are in renewed fervor, will arise as one man to overcome the enemy at home, and bring forth a France regenerate. All the sufferings of to-day may then be counted as a wholesome adversity.

Whither Indeed?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Like Mr. Woodlock, I was much taken by the article "Whither," in the March Atlantic. It is a keen indictment of the bankruptcy of science, that is of the mechanical theory of the universe, and at the same time a threnody on the loss to the world of the spiritual ideals which the "shadow of the crass materialism" of the hour have eclipsed in the souls of men. As Mr. Woodlock says, its anonymous author "utters some thoughts that deserve attention." But there are other thoughts which call for a critical consideration. Indeed, underlying his thesis is a radical fallacy, typical of the times and irritatingly in conflict with the admirable purpose of the writer. His brave challenge to the materialism of the hour and his gallant charge upon the breast works of the enemy we can not but applaud, but for that very reason we are doubly chagrined and startled to see him leave his own rear so deplorably exposed.

The fact is he surrenders the fundamentals upon which the fabric of his contention rests. While he would cling tenaciously to the old spiritualities, the loss of which he avers has profoundly impoverished modern life, he recklessly abandons the only positions which make those spiritualities secure. What avail to trumpet the failure of the materialistic philosophy, if the futilities of one's own are equally obvious? Deploring the methods of theologians in defending Christianity against the attacks of the materialists of the nineteenth century, the author makes the following startling declaration:

> How greatly the defenders of the faith, in much of the warfare, have missed the issue! The time that has been lost, the good territory yielded in contesting the literal interpretations of Genesis, may well fill us with shame. If the story of the serpent of Eden must slip from dogma to myth, must faith in the unseen realities go? If our forefathers were wrong in linking the large faith of their spiritual lives indissolubly with the story of Adam and that of Jonah, we must discriminate where they failed to discriminate. . . . In the long quarrels over the husk, the kernel has too long slipped out of sight; essentials have gone with unessentials. We can no longer in good faith teach the young that the misfortunes of our present predicament may be traced to eating an apple.

Without stopping to determine some unwarrantable implications in the passage quoted, the heart of the matter is that our author totally abandons the doctrine of the fall of man, and this on the ground that materialistic science has disproved it. He adjures us to hold fast to the old spiritualities, while he relegates to the region of myths the primal spiritual fact (for spiritual facts are as real as material), upon which the whole of Christianity pivots. And he does this under the menace of a materialistic assumption, or, to put it bluntly, under the pressure of a materialistic bluff. The materialistic attitude, which he flouts and derides and deplores, is the very bogey which frightens him out of his boots at the first encounter. Materialism points its pistol (with a blank cartridge in it) and shouts "hands up," and up they go without so much as a murmur from our anxious defender of Christianity!

Here I may point out a psychological marvel typical of the modern temperament, viz., a perfervid seriousness mixed with a persiflage in evading the vital issue. Our present predicament, our author states, can not be traced to eating an apple. Our present predicament, i. e., the debased estate of man, is not bound up in the mere material fact of eating an apple; but it can be and is traced in the Christian catenation of truth linked with truth and fact with fact, to the formal act of the father of the race eating the forbidden fruit in defiance of the expressed prohibition of his God and Creator. The essence of that act was sin, and our "present predicament" is in fact and in truth traceable to that original sin. With this primal truth and fact is linked indissolubly the other sublime truth and fact, the incarnation of Jesus Christ and the redemption of man by the second Adam. To repudiate the first is to reject the latter. The author of "Whither?" admits his forefathers had "a profounder knowledge than ours of things spiritual." They had indeed, and for that reason they held fast to facts spiritual, for they realized that things spiritual were more than mere hypotheses, and in things visible were to be seen the things invisible. They refused to give up the spiritual facts for materialistic fancies, and their firm anchorage in the eternal spiritualities came from their sure faith in the verity of both the body and soul of the message delivered. To forswear the external facts of Christianity, under the supposition that you are thereby saving its soul, is like cutting a man's head off in order to save his humanity.

The reason of our author's ready surrender is not far to seek, for in spite of his repeatedly declared yearning for the old spiritualities, he is an out-and-out Modernist. What he wants is not the Christianity which so nobly inspired his forefathers and made them heroic in the battle of life, but a Neo-Christianity; not a return to the Revelation of Jesus Christ, but an interpretation of Christianity which will rid it of the old truths now in the discard of materialistic science. It is not the old wine in new bottles that he longs for, but new wine in new bottles. Witness this statement of Modernism stripped to its lowest terms:

> Myth could go, dogma itself could go, Christianity would still be. Milestones in the path of the human spirit, dogmas have done great service, but none have been great enough to express the potential greatness of the spiritual life of the human race. Greatly have they helped; at times they have greatly hindered. Seemingly necessary bulwarks in time of stress and siege, the human soul has lived on after their demolishing; the human spirit is greater than they.

This is Modernism as baldly stated as possible. Christianity is not the body of truths revealed by Jesus Christ and confided to the Church which He instituted in their integrity to mankind, but a subjective evolution out of human consciousness unfolding in the course of time, by which "the potential greatness of the spiritual life of the human race is gradually realized."

Passing over the complete misapprehension of what dogma really is in the Catholic sense, viz., the authoritative definition of a true doctrine, the point to be noted is that our author has totally betrayed his own case. He has postulated the very creed he decries, "the dreary positivism of our day." He has swathed Christianity in the cerements of materialistic evolution. His constant clamor about spiritualities and his insistent denunciation of the body and the flesh are of no avail, for the value of their distinction is lost in his admitted acceptance of the evolutionary hypothesis by which Materialism would explain the universe. To apply the evolutionary hypothesis of Materialism to the spiritual life is to deny the spiritual quality. The author thus drags Christianity down to the level of the materialistic thumb-rule. The Materialist's retort to his plea for spiritualities is that what he calls spiritualities are nothing more than etherealized products of the evolutionary process, matter sublimated into dreams and myths to be distinguished from the grosser results only by the fact that they are spun out a little finer; in truth, nothing more than ultra-refined by-products of cosmic energies, iridescent cobwebs of the looms of time. His own appetite for righteousness is different in degree from the predatory hunger of the tiger, but not in kind. Come into my parlor says the spider to the fly, and the tragedy is closed.

We may indeed sympathize with our author in his protest against the Materialism of the hour. He is one struggling for better things and hoping for higher things in the gross miasma from the bogs and valleys of sense. But the way out is not over the treacherous quicksands of Modernism. Black is not white, and you do not make white whiter by mixing it with black. The way to defend Christianity is to defend it, Christianity with all that it means and implies. You can not pluck from the body of Catholic Truth, this or that doctrine, which may seem beautiful or consoling or helpful. Take all or leave all, for

> Faith and unfaith can ne'er be equal powers,
> Unfaith in aught is want of faith in all.

The Extent of Bigotry

To the Editor of America:

In objecting to Father Bull's article on "A Ludicrous Anachronism," I made the statement: "The spirit of intolerant bigotry is as rife in our land to-day as ever in the history of the past." In spite of his reply I stand to my guns. He seems to take no notice of the distinction between the spirit of bigotry and the effects of bigotry. In "A Ludicrous Anachronism" bigotry and know-nothingism were identified. It was argued that because know-nothingism had had its fling and passed away, bigotry was also a thing of the past. The know-nothing movement was one branch of bigotry's tree. It has been lopped off. Therefore the spirit of bigotry has been destroyed root and branch. It seems Father Bull's non sequitur fits his own argument very neatly.

The view of bigotry expressed in the letter on the "Extent of Bigotry" (AMERICA, March 20) is too narrow. "A thing to be bigotry must injure Catholics as Catholics." In other words the writer wishes to make it a spirit which will conscientiously and wilfully wrong Catholics simply and solely because they are Catholics. This is a very extreme form of bigotry and if Father Bull would stand by such a definition I am afraid he would find it very difficult to prove that the American people, as a whole, or even a determining part of our nation, ever since the days of Washington, were bigoted. He admits implicitly that at one time the American people were bigoted, but surely he can not mean to say that by such a statement he would indict the majority of Americans as having persecuted Catholics simply and solely because they were Catholics.

The spirit of bigotry is one that enters into the very heart and soul of a man. It colors his views. It blinds him to all save his own side of a question. For years it may lie smouldering like ash-covered embers, but let a strong personality fan it into flame and see the results. Then like a ball of fire it consumes a man's better judgment. It hurries him on to words and actions which in calmer moments could have no place in his life. Under its influence fables, falsehoods, slanders, calumnies lose their malice. Such a man argues that there may be some little exaggeration in what he hears, but in the main, it is all too true. Add to these another very important factor, frequently lost sight of, and we have a pretty strong reason why we should not say bigotry is dead because it is not supremely alive. Mob psychology has something to do with anti-Catholic outbursts in their violent forms. You can not take as indicative of American thought in general what you find in the individuals as individuals. A person as an individual may think in one groove, but explain it how he will, some subtle change comes over him when he is one of a crowd. As a member of a mob he is swayed hither and thither at the will of a strong unscrupulous leader. The mob thinks not for itself. The demagogues shape its mind. This is as true to-day as it was sixty years ago. The gangs that formed throughout the country to play havoc on life and property were moved, not so much by an inborn hatred for Catholics as Catholics, as by the frenzied, diabolical speeches of a comparatively small number of violent agitators. To-day, given a sort of natural antipathy in the non-Catholic breast, let men of Tom Watson's or "Rev." Teddy Walker's stamp (and there are plenty of them) get a hearing with an American mob and see how much of a "Ludicrous Anachronism" is anti-Catholicism.

Proofs that the spirit of bigotry is very much alive in our country are sought. One need but take the Catholic weeklies or monthlies and read, not the words only, but the sense contained therein. To say nothing of the Pilot and other equally well-informed papers, AMERICA hardly slips a week without an open or an implied reference to some anti-Catholic outburst. In the issue of March 6 there are eight editorials. Three of them are directed against bigotry. A repetition of this occurs in the issue of March 20. These examples are taken at random. Mutatis mutandis the like may be found in other Catholic journals. There is hardly space to multiply instances of this nature, but can we for a moment imagine that Catholic editors are so hard pushed for matter that they must pad their columns with comments on the dead form, anti-Catholic prejudice?

In his letter of March 20 the writer "admits that bigotry is rising here and there in our country." What does he mean by "here and there"? To what, if not to an anti-Catholic spirit can he ascribe the developments in the present country-wide socialistic campaign? Socialists say they aim not at the Catholic Church. Their actions belie their words. Hidden hate is hate for all that. The socialists hate and will fight with newspapers and periodicals (which are certainly not a few) the Catholic Church because they recognize that while she remains in the trenches socialism has little hope of ultimate success. May be some cause other than bigotry will explain the I. W. W. riots in our churches! What of the scurrilous pamphlets circulated in Massachusetts and New York to defeat Catholic candidates for the governorship of these States? If one of those candidates triumphed it was not owing to a lack of bigotry, but it was in spite of bigotry. The Reverend M. Kenny, in a very enlightening article published not long since in the Catholic Mind, has thrown some interesting flashes on the inside workings of Freemasonry. Anti-Catholicism has nothing to do with Masonic activities! Perish the thought! What is to be said of some of our Southern States? Mississippi, the Carolinas, Georgia are surely running pell-mell to impress upon the Catholic brow the kiss of peace! Arizona, with her laws virtually making the celebration of Mass a felony, is certainly wiping her pallid brow and raising her right hand aloft and murmuring, "Lord, deliver me from the sin of bigotry." The thousands of signatures to letters of protest which found their way into the White House when our President accepted an invitation to attend the Holy Sacrifice offered in thanksgiving to God for favors showered upon our country, were animated by the most uninterested patriotism!

A few more examples such as the Carnegie Foundation, the hue and cry raised that Catholics are trying to get control of our public schools if they but suggest that it is unfair to keep the knowledge of Christ from their children, the attacks on the habited Sisters in the Indian schools of the West, might give one pause when his optimism prompts him to indulge in the fond fancy that bigotry is a "Ludicrous Anachronism." It may be true that each one of these instances does not in itself suffice to prove widespread bigotry, but who will deny that when taken collectively they do suffice to make us at least question the assertion that anti-Catholicism has passed from American minds?

Are we Catholics to say that we are not persecuted simply because our churches are not burned, because our homes, our hospitals, our orphanages are not dynamited? Must we, forsooth, consider ourselves fortunate because we may venture abroad without the fear of returning with a cracked skull? Fair play! Is it fair play to make the Catholic Church a peg on which to hang the reels of ignominy and insult invented by diabolical brains? There are evils worse than clubs and guns and burning torches. Clubs and guns and burning torches were the weapons used sixty years ago. They failed. Anti-Catholicism has found new weapons. This is evident from what we have said. The spirit of bigotry may be dormant, but it is certainly not a bygone fad. A volcano to be a volcano need not be in constant eruption. Smoke and poisonous gases are enough to warn us of its danger. Perhaps in these United States, steadily broadening even to the verge of becoming a nation of divorced men and fatherless children, there is enough smoke to warn us that Catholicism and the principles for which she stands will not be safe from attack when they interfere with the views of those who are opposed to her.

New York. L. RONALD.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Did the writer of "A Ludicrous Anachronism" purpose to describe a de facto condition of affairs in our republic, or a condition of affairs much to be desired?

If the first, either the entire article is an abortive child of the pen, a misfit, a truly "Ludicrous Anachronism," or AMERICA and, with it the Catholic publications throughout the length and breadth of the land, are laboring under a great delusion, and their editors stand, as children, affrighted by some chimeric creation of their own fantasy. Briefly, one is forced to take sides, either with Father Bull's "Ludicrous Anachronism," or with the authoritative editors of AMERICA and the other Catholic periodicals. No one can hesitate in the choice.

But perhaps the writer's purpose in "A Ludicrous Anachronism" was to describe the second member of my introductory disjunction. If so, his recent reply to Mr. Ronald was superfluous (being beside the question), or it may be he is prepared to uphold either side of the question—"Is Bigotry Rife in America?"

The readers of America will anxiously await the coming edition of the paper, where it is hoped Father Bull will prove the opposite of what most Catholics have always considered a fact.

New York. A. M. Inzpeigh.

Prohibition

To the Editor of America:

More power to the writers of the articles "Temperance Against Prohibition" in your esteemed review! They are on the right road. . . . Prohibition is ineffective against the evils of drunkenness. It is based upon the fallacy that not rational men, but irrational creatures, are responsible for the evils of our times. As a factor in morality, prohibition has proved a dismal failure everywhere. Federal statistics and court records show that, on the average and in proportion to population, there is more drunkenness, vice, crime, misdemeanor, poverty, divorce and insanity in dry territory than in wet territory. Maine with her sixty years of prohibition "blessings" has been marching at the head of the States with a high divorce rate. The Portland Argus, quoted by the Bangor Daily News for May 14, 1914, stated that, according to official reports, the number of arrests for drunkenness in "dry" Portland, Maine, during 1913, was over 4,000, or one arrest for this offence to every fifteen inhabitants. According to the Daily News for March 17, 1914, the number of arrests for drunkenness in Bangor, during 1913, was exactly 2,152, or one arrest for the same offence to every eleven inhabitants. The number of arrests for drunkenness was, therefore, a great deal larger in Portland and Bangor than in "wet" Pittsburgh. Out of thirty large cities in our country, extra dry Memphis, Tenn., had during nine years the highest murder rate, while human life was safest in extra-wet Milwaukee. This has been proved by the statistician Frederick Hoffman, in a recent issue of the Spectator.

There are many well-meaning people at the head of the prohibition movement. This does not prove that they are right. A man may champion an error with the same sincerity with which he defends a truth. The dry agitators obstinately confound the use with the abuse, temperance and total abstinence with prohibition, though all these conceptions are vitally different. Temperance means use in moderation, while prohibition is the forbidding by civil law of the manufacture, sale and use of alcoholic beverages. Total abstinence is the habitual and voluntary refraining from all intoxicating beverages. No priest who celebrates Mass can be a total abstainer. It is unfair to marshal the Fathers of the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore into the ranks of the prohibitionists. The Fathers called the liquor traffic quæstus in se non illicitus, a business which is in itself lawful. They warned against the abuse of the liquor traffic and against the evils resulting from the abuse. Let us stand for the strict regulation, not for the abolition, of the liquor traffic. The prohibition bugaboo has done more harm than good. Let us ship the water wagon back to Turkey!

Mannington, W. Va. C. J. Kluser.

To the Editor of America:

I have been reading with much interest the "Prohibition" articles that are appearing in your columns. No, not with interest. They are the same old articles that we are reading everywhere these days by the advocates of "moderate" drinking and "strict" regulation. These articles are written by the same class of people who were howling their heads off in the days before the Civil War about the immorality of abolition, the well-fed people who sit at their desks and spin theories, but who know nothing about the real problems of life. They fear confiscation of saloon property, but they give never a thought to the confiscation of the wages of the poor fellows who have to run the gauntlet of the saloons on their way home from work every night. These hair-splitters are all wrought up over the fear that we may become a nation of drug fiends if our "light drinks" are taken away from us, and in the same breath they have the effrontery to refer to other people as "fanatics." My advice to them is to throw the statistics of the liquor dealers' associations into the waste basket and take a trip through the State of Kansas. Not a Pullman-car trip, but one that will take them among the people. Better still, let them visit the Catholic communities of the State, and if they can find a more contented people, I would like to hear from them. I never knew a man to go into Kansas with an open mind that didn't come out with his ideas against prohibition severely jolted.

For the past twelve years I have traveled the country from Indiana to Texas and from Texas to North Dakota, and I know something about wet and dry conditions from actual experience. I know the change for the better that has been wrought in many communities that have had the courage to introduce prohibition. The man who says that prohibition means drug fiends doesn't know the first thing about the subject from the practical standpoint. He is a mere spinner of theories, nothing else. Prohibition does inconvenience some people for a while—it usually rids a community of an element that can well be spared—but the good outweighs the inconvenience a hundred times over. Christianity bids the strong help the weak. The man who says he can leave drink alone without any trouble should leave it alone for the benefit of the weaker brother who can not. "Lead us not into temptation." But, then, we handle very few of our problems from a Christian standpoint.

It is all very well for the man who can take his drink at his club to tell us about the great moral issues at stake; but the fact remains that alcohol is made to be sold, and it is going to be sold, law or no law. In the meantime, while the doctors are splitting hairs, we are ruining young men and old men by the thousands. If the author of "Temperance against Prohibition" can show a wet city in the United States that has not an acute saloon problem, a city where alcohol is not either the dominant or a streng factor in politics, I would like to visit it. He can talk about "civil service" and "regulation" until "the cows come home." He might just as well talk about regulating the devil. So long as liquor is allowed to be sold, it will seep through any wall erected against it. Sisseton, S. D., conceived the idea, a few years ago, of a municipal saloon under the direct supervision of the authorities. Sisseton kept the saloon one year, then gave it up. For years we have been fed on the "regulation" of the "light wine" districts of Europe, but the war brought us the news that the wine-drinking Frenchman had gone to absinthe. Like all beer and light wine drinkers, he found he needed something stronger occasionally to get the "kick." And did not the Government of France give that "beverage" the Kansas treatment?

The intemperate drinker is not the only problem. The "moderate" drinker is a problem as well. There is not a moderate drinker of my acquaintance who can afford to spend $100 a year for drink; yet that is only about twenty cents a day—a small amount for the average drinker. The men in ordinary circumstances who spend more than that are legion. And what is worse, the "moderate" drinker as a rule always has an ache of some kind or other. He is never just right. He must have his bracer in the morning; his cocktail for an appetizer; his créme de menthe for a settler; a drink of gin for his kidneys, and a night cap to induce sleep. Tell him that he is a drinker and he becomes indignant. He talks about "personal liberty" and "fanatics." In his estimation only "cranks" think that the liquor laws should be rigidly enforced. He can abstain whenever he wishes, but when he wants a drink he should be able to get it. He blames everything under the sun when he is short of cash or not in fit condition; but he never blames the alcohol.

Now, I am no more in favor of prohibitory laws than any one else; but I am sick and tired of this eternal compromising with an evil that has touched too many families; an evil that has retarded the work of the Church in the United States more than any other thing. I have talked and worked for "regulation," but I am through with that. It looks nice on paper; but it's a fraud. The great majority of men would never think of taking a drink if it wasn't under their nose all the time; and that is the class of men who intend to get rid of alcohol. It is not the "fanatics"; it is not the "reformers." It is the men who know from actual experience what the evils of drink are. I do not think the religious element entered into the passage of the Arizona law. Lack of foresight brought on the quandary about the Mass. Mormon Utah is liable to do anything to other religions; but what that State does should not be held up as an example, any more than the action of the Arkansas legislature in passing a convent inspection bill should be held up as an example of what other States are going to do. Prohibition laws have been passed in fifteen or more other States, and Mass is being said legally in every one of them. Instead of acting as a brake on the wheel, we should see to it that our rights are properly safeguarded.

Christ, for some good reason of His own, blessed wine for the wedding guests; but the man who tries to reconcile liquor drinking as we know it to-day with that act of the Saviour's is hard put for excuses. The wine of Cana is not strong enough to flavor American alcohol.

Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The letter printed in your issue of March 27, replying to my article on "Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.," seems to have been written for the purpose of drawing attention away from the outstanding fact that the Y. M. C. A. is a Protestant religious organization which Catholics can not join without danger to their faith.

The papal encyclical which your correspondent quotes to bring confusion on my head allows freedom of opinion and practice only in matters outside faith and discipline. The Holy Father was not there giving Catholics permission to join Protestant religious organizations—not even tacit permission. There is no need for a special decree to tell Catholics that they must avoid such associations. The natural law itself forbids such an affiliation, to say nothing about the prohibition implied in the positive divine law.

Confusion in this matter arises chiefly from the fact that most Catholics do not realize that the Y. M. C. A. is really a religious organization. If your correspondent is able to disprove this contention, he can then with better grace defend Catholics who become members. He states that the Church permits membership in such associations provided there is no proximate danger to faith or morals. My article was written to prove that such danger exists. He does not, however, join issue on this point. It would be better for him to make some effort to prove that there is no danger to the faith of Catholics in joining the Y. M. C. A. before he assumes that he has the Pope on his side giving tacit permission.

I have been charged with having impeached the faith of Mr. McCloskey and his Catholic associates in the Y. M. C. A., and of having accused them of being disloyal Catholics. Actually I said that a Catholic who joins the Y. M. C. A., realizing that it is a Protestant religious organization which discriminates against him for being a Catholic, does so at a sacrifice of loyalty and self-respect. Your correspondent has throughout his letter exaggerated the extension of this statement, and distorted it to bring it under the censure of the Holy Father's encyclical, which is directed against contentions of an entirely different kind and tenor.

"Stated universally," he writes, the chief argument would read: "No Catholic can be loyal to his faith and retain his self-respect who joins a voluntary organization or society from the higher offices of which Catholics are excluded." He then attempts to draw a parallel from the case of a Catholic who would become a British subject, "thus affiliating himself with a civil society whose chief ruler and other high functionaries can not be Catholics." I deny that he has correctly "stated universally" my chief argument. I state it thus: The Y. M. C. A. is a Protestant religious organization which discriminates against Catholics on religious grounds though admitting them to limited membership; it is dangerous to the faith of Catholics who join it because it practises religious liberalism and is not entirely free from proselyting influences; therefore no Catholic can become a member without a sacrifice of loyalty and self-respect. To prove that his following a parallel is really flying off on a tangent it is only necessary to point out that the Catholic who becomes a British subject joins, as your correspondent himself says, "a civil society whose chief ruler and high functionaries can not be Catholics"; and that the Catholic who joins the Y. M. C. A. joins a Protestant religious organization, which discriminates against him for being a Catholic, and enters into surroundings which are proximately dangerous to his faith.

The rest of his letter is taken up with showing that there is present need of a Catholic organization to do for Catholic young men what the Y. M. C. A. is doing for its members. I heartily agree with him in this, though I am not so ready as he is to lay the lack of such an organization to "some one's neglect, lack of foresight or indifference." I think the reasons for this lack were made sufficiently clear in the last paragraph of the article he has attacked.

The final sentence of this letter is as follows: "In keeping with her [the Church's] spirit and her express command the opponents of the Y. M. C. A. should confine themselves to criticism of that organization, and refrain from abusing or questioning the faith and loyalty of its Catholic members." I deny that it is in keeping with the spirit of the Church, or that she has given any command to attack the Y. M. C. A. Moreover, I am not an "opponent" of the Y. M. C. A. I do not blame the Y. M. C. A. for discriminating against Catholic members; I think it should exclude them altogether. I deny that I have abused or questioned the faith of its Catholic members. As to their loyalty, I have undoubtedly called that into question, but here I must be allowed to explain that by loyalty I mean that spirit that makes a young man stand by the Church, even to his own personal self-sacrifice, through thick and thin, for richer, for poorer, for better, for worse; which makes him disdain to accept gifts from the hands of representatives of a religion which was founded in rivalry and protest against her; which makes him no more eager to stand by her when she is the Bountiful Mother than when she is the Lady Poverty.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In perusing the columns of your valuable paper, I became interested in the article, "Catholics in the Y. M. C. A." It astonished me to see attached to the strong defence of the Y. M. C. A. the splendid Catholic name of Leo Paul McCloskey. To quote from his article: "Since I joined the association several years ago, I have not heard any talk about religion, except among the Catholics themselves."

In order to prove the statement that the Y. M. C. A. is sectarian, I quote from the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, March 15, the following, which had the headline:

THE HARRIET JUDSON RECORD

Mrs. Edward Thomas tells what has been accomplished during the fifteen months that the Y. W. C. A. boarding house has been in existence. One of the greatest joys of the home is the recreation room. Here immediately after dinner each night a short vesper service is held. Attendance is optional. A goodly number of girls take part in the service, which is informal and very helpful. . . . After the devotional exercises the room is transferred into a veritable playroom.

It is a disgrace to our Catholicism to know that so many of our religion find their recreations among non-Catholics. I have had occasion several times to reprove some of my young and inexperienced pupils for joining this association and seeing no harm in it, and I agree with AMERICA in stating that a Catholic can not accept the terms of the Y. M. C. A. without sacrificing loyalty and self respect. Perhaps Leo Paul McCloskey did not quite mean all that he said.

[The Catholic Convert is published monthly by The Catholic Converts' League, 117 West 61st Street, New York City. Pax, the Caldey quarterly and other Caldey publications, may be ordered through Mr. H. C. Watts, 128 East 93rd Street, New York City.—Editor, AMERICA.]

For Protestants' Consideration

To the Editor of AMERICA:

With a few notable exceptions, this generation of Protestant ministers, it seems to me, are of no force in the cause of truth. With them should be included, I regret to say, most Protestant bishops and the editors of Protestant papers. I do not believe that any observant student of current topics, any believer in the duty and responsibilities of the Protestant clergy as the leaders of their people, will dispute the fact that the clergy of all denominations are expected not only to teach and defend truth but to attack error, wherever and whenever error violates the laws of God or man.

In the little city where I reside there are six Protestant ministers who have been, and I believe still are, weekly readers and subscribers to that filthy sheet which disgraces our State. I know, personally, of other Protestant clergymen, former residents of this place and many ministers in towns and cities of several States, who give that paper and those like it moral and financial support. Indeed if the statements printed in that sheet are true, there are thousands of ministers who read that paper and promote its circulation.

Good American Christians can not tolerate treason to God or country. But these sheets print charges, which, if true, would make many millions of American citizens appear as traitors to God and country. If this vast multitude are really traitors, however, is it not the duty of the Protestant clergy to denounce them with an authoritative voice from all the pulpits in the land? Are they doing so? No. We hear no denunciations from these ministers. The reason is they must be fully aware that the charges made by the publications in question are false and malicious.

As Christian men, true Americans, as leaders of their people, are their voices raised in refuting the calumnies or silencing the calumniators? For the most part, no. Therefore they ally themselves in a conspiracy of silence with the editors of the Protestant press. By their silence they fail in their duty as teachers and defenders of truth, as spiritual leaders of men and as patriots, for they do not instruct the gullible and bigoted members of their flocks regarding the calumnies written about the Catholic Church, its doctrines, discipline and members. In shirking their duty in this matter, and in supporting immoral, mendacious papers with money and patronage, are not these ministers proving themselves failures as shepherds of their flocks? By silence and consent they allow their congregations to violate God's commandment regarding their neighbor's fair name and they aid and abet those who defraud Catholics of the rights they should enjoy according to the Constitution of the United States.

What is the cause of this attitude? Is it crass ignorance or malice? Indifferent they certainly can not be, whether educated or not, after reading the obscenity and lies with which this kind of "literature" abounds. Both to the decent Protestant and to the indignant Catholic it is plain that the readers and supporters of such papers have prurient and perverted minds. Is the principle, "All ways of combating Romanism are fair," one they wish to add to the tenets of Protestantism? If so, the non-Catholic laity must assume the leadership of their leaders and, standing beside fair-minded ministers like Dr. Gladden, put down this revived Know-nothingism.

Why Prefer Catholic Colleges?

To the Editor of AMERICA:

My experience as a student at three different universities, and as a teacher at one university, all large and all non-Catholic, leads me to sound a warning against them. It was not, indeed, a rare thing in my own experience to hear freak doctrines launched forth from professorial chairs with all the dogmatic assurance of truth. A fling at Christianity here and a sneer at the Ancient Church there, contaminated the atmosphere in which thousands of young citizens were being trained. A professor may be an authority on bugs or on prehistoric oysters, but that gives no weight to his opinions on the problem of human existence, although many an unthinking student believes that it does. For solid undergraduate scholarship and sensible training of heart and mind, and as a preparation for good citizenship, I believe that in general Catholic colleges excel all others. One can feel sure that within their walls the students are not drinking in the pagan doctrines that pose under the name of "eugenics" or the citizenship-destroying teachings of socialism. Example and the force of personality are powerful aids in teaching. The small classes of Catholic colleges where the students are in intimate contact with godly self-sacrificing professors, men of high ideals and wide scholarship, are much more favorable for the promotion of good citizenship than are the crowded million-dollar laboratories of the large universities. In the latter, narrow-minded specialists often give to their subject an emphasis that is out of all proportion to the needs of the younger students. The large universities are valuable for post-graduate work along special lines, but as training places for undergraduate students, as mills for turning out solidly instructed citizens, they do not compare with Catholic colleges.

The battle of Matamoras about to begin. Judging from numbers and equipment it will be hard. Fifteen hundred refugees, mostly women and children, are crossing the border at Brownsville. Unknown numbers crossing at other places. I have been asked to help provide food, shelter and hospital supplies.

Black and White

AS colors they are not in themselves provocative of strife, and people may affect either or both without inciting hostility; but in the moral order it is otherwise. "He who is not with Me is against Me," said the Lord, and so, morally and religiously, the Blacks are waging incessant war against the Whites. Cain could not tolerate Abel's peaceful and virtuous ways, and so he killed him. Emphasizing the whiteness that should characterize His closest imitators, Christ invited them to leave all things—friends, family, worldly goods and ambitions—and follow Him. The Apostles and disciples did so, and forthwith the world ridiculed, ostracized, persecuted, banished, punished, imprisoned, and finally killed them, for the most part. So it has continued, according to the modes of time and place, even to our day: "If the world hate you, know ye, that it hated Me before you . . . because you are not of the world . . . therefore the world hateth you."

Hence we should not be surprised, nor greatly shocked, if the same world, even in this free land of ours, persists in persecuting the chosen ones of Christ, who have consecrated themselves to Him in poverty, chastity and obedience according to the inmost spirit of His law.

Consequent on the slanderous activities of the Menace and its kind, supported by more dangerous though less outspoken agencies, bills have been introduced into a number of our legislatures, providing that all convents, hospitals, schools, houses of reformation, and so on, shall be subject to inspection by sheriff, grand jury, or a certain number of citizens. The Arkansas legislature has achieved the distinction of passing such a measure, empowering any twenty of its citizens to inaugurate such an inquiry. Should the infamous measure go into effect any twenty bigots can, personally or by deputy, pry into, ransack and disorganize any Catholic convent, school, hospital, or home for the aged, deaf-mutes, infirm or orphans, by day or night, in this much-vaunted land of liberty. Of such laws a Commission appointed by Governor Ferguson, of Texas, where Catholics are a small minority, reports:

> In this bill, as in its predecessors, is concealed the cloven hoof. To enact a law providing that upon the petition of twenty persons an inspection of reputable institutions could be made by County Commissioners would be bad per se and would introduce a principle and precedent in legislation that could but result in promiscuous meddling without providing a single safeguard to good society.
> Reputable institutions, such as private hospitals, reformatory homes, convents, asylums, sectarian seminaries, etc., are subject to every kind of inspection that due regard for efficiency, cleanliness and sanitation could properly require or demand. But, aside from this fact, this particular bill is a veiled and unprovoked effort, whether wittingly or unwittingly, to encourage a vicious and unwarranted anti-Catholic sentiment in the American State. This republic was founded, in the wisdom of the fathers, upon the principle that America should forever remain a harbor of refuge for the oppressed of every land; the home and citadel of religious and political liberty, sustaining and perpetuating a Government where every citizen could worship God after the dictates of his own conscience and uninterruptedly enjoy the rights of property, religious and political freedom and the pursuit of happiness.
> We respectfully recommend that the bill be not passed.

And AMERICA respectfully recommends that Catholics, as individuals or organizations, in city, State and nation, insist that in works of education and benevolence we, as well as all other citizens, shall be dealt with according to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution, and that those who openly or covertly oppose such action shall be branded as the fanatics that they are.

The "Catholic World's" Jubilee

TO start a Catholic monthly just as the Civil War came to a close was a bold undertaking. Money was scarce, Catholics were only one-fourth as numerous as they are to-day; they were not a reading people, and half-a-dozen magazines begun by Catholics had failed. Nevertheless, Father Isaac T. Hecker, the founder of the Paulists, had the splendid courage to issue in April, 1865, the first number of the Catholic World, and now its fourth editor, Father John J. Burke, who came after Father Doyle, who was Father Hewit's successor, has brought out the six-hundredth issue of the famous periodical. From the sketches of the magazine's history that are published in this excellent Jubilee Number some idea may be had of how much the Catholic World has done during the past fifty years to promote the intellectual activity of American Catholics and to present attractively to unbelievers the claims of the Church. Among the 300 contributors of note whose names are mentioned can be found such valiant champions of the truth as Brownson, Shea, Hassard, Clarke and Miss Tincker, and it was in the pages of the Catholic World that the literary papers of Miss Repplier and Miss Guiney first appeared.

The Holy Father pays a well-merited tribute to our highly-valued contemporary, "which in fifty years of uninterrupted labor has accomplished a noble and holy apostolate in defence of the Church and of Christian civilization," and Cardinal Farley sends his warm congratulations to "one of the most valiant and most efficient defenders of Holy Church." America rejoices to echo these praises and sincerely hopes that the Catholic World may continue to achieve the lofty object Father Hecker had in founding the magazine, viz.: "To draw men by the capable, intelligent expression of Catholic truth; to make fairness and beauty of style an index of the fairness and beauty within; to show that Catholic truth illumines, fulfils all, and leads man to the supernatural life of Jesus Christ."

A Silly Protest

A VERY foolish petition was recently presented to King George of England by an association calling itself the "Protestant British-Israel League." A few paragraphs from the document will serve to show the extraordinary mentality of the petitioners:

> Your petitioners humbly beg permission to draw your Majesty's gracious attention to the remarkable fact that in almost every instance concessions to Rome have been met by manifestations of divine displeasure, while opposition to Rome has been signalized by tokens of the Almighty's approval as follows:
> The passing of the Home Rule Bill for Ireland was followed by the sinking of the Empress of Ireland. The Royal Assent to the Bill was followed by the sinking of the three cruisers, Hogue, Cressy and Aboukir. The despatch of Sir Henry Howard as your Majesty's Plenipotentiary to the Pope was followed by the bombardment of the Yorkshire coast. The reception of Sir Henry Howard by the Pope was followed by the sinking of the Formidable. The issue of the Government White Paper, to endeavor to justify the British Mission to the Vatican, was followed by the air raid on Yarmouth and King's Lynn.

Apart from the slur which the petitioners cast upon the thousands of British Catholics who are fighting their country's cause in the war and, apart from the misrepresentation of facts in implying "concessions to Rome," where none were made, stands out the plain historical fact, that during the whole course of English history opposition to Rome was signalized by anything but blessings. There was no such poverty as that which occurred during the reigns of Henry VIII and Elizabeth. The reigns of Stephen, John, Henry III, and Edward II were periods of suffering under sovereigns who had put themselves into conflict with the Church. Moreover, the English kings who laid the foundations of their country's glory were not Protestants. Alfred the Great, who delivered England from the Danes, was a Catholic and went to Mass. Cnut was a Catholic; so, too, were Edward the Confessor, William the Conqueror, Richard I, Edward III, Henry VII; and when England had had enough of her violently sectarian Commonwealth she called to the throne of his fathers Charles II, who died a Catholic, though a penitent one.

The commercial prosperity which has fallen to England's lot since she identified herself with the revolt against the Church, is, so the Protestant British-Israelites would have us believe, under the special protection of a kind of British Protestant tribal deity:

> On the other hand, the strong protest of the United Protestant Societies against the British Mission to the Pope—which was forwarded to the Prime Minister, to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, to the leaders of the Opposition, and to the press—was followed by a signal proof of the divine approval in the British naval victory in the North Sea, and the sinking of the German Blücher.

For compound silliness the "Protestant British-Israel League" unquestionably bears away the palm. Truly may it be said that lack of a sense of humor is one of the notes of Protestantism.

Lessons in Decency

TWO cities have recently given the world lessons in decency; one is Boston, the other Philadelphia. The Mayor of the former city has put his foot down hard on bad plays. One of these corroded the heel of his boot, squirmed out, and fled to New York, where it is resting comfortably. The others are probably awaiting the rebuilding of Sodom and Gomorrha. Philadelphia, too, is astir in the cause of morality. There is a censorship for films there. That is galling to those who love gold more than souls, and they determined to abolish it. These traffickers in the temple did not reckon with their host, however. And a host it is, fifty thousand members of the Holy Name Union, pledged to honor God by thought and word and deed. They would have none of this renewed "attempt to make money at the expense of a community's morals." The lawmakers were made to realize this, too. The fearless and eloquent Bishop McCort left them in no doubt of it when he said: "This Society battled to secure these laws and will battle to maintain them. The minds of our children must not be left open once more to debauchery and demoralization."

Boston has given a lesson in decency; so has Philadelphia. Two, only? Yet, there are a few other cities in the United States. Is there no way of making them ring with those golden words: "The minds of our children must not be left open once more to debauchery and demoralization"? That sentence points the way to the reform of the world. It should resound in every nook and corner of the land.

The Cost of "Success"

To the Editor of America:

The enclosed "Success Club" literature is spreading among Catholics. It was sent to me because a Catholic woman enrolled me in the organization without my knowledge. She has been a member for some years, is a strong advocate of the "Club" and a firm believer in it. The dues are $5.00 a year. America, I think, should pass judgment on this movement.

Brooklyn. M. E. B.

WE wish to thank our correspondent for the very enjoyable quarter of an hour the perusal of the "Success Club" literature afforded. The author of the pamphlet, entitled "Instructions from the Success Club" is a subtle humorist who is literally turning his gift into gold. For it costs $5.00 a year to belong to the organization, and the book on "The Law of Mentalism," which no self-respecting member will, of course, be without, can be had for the merely nominal price of $2.25. That the sum is ridiculously low for so useful a volume is proved by the attestation of "Member No. 147,860," who found the book of "more value than anything I ever gave $25.00 for." But let us have a taste of the humorist's quality: Every day this month at 1.00 p. m. and 8.00 p. m. members of the club who live in our eastern time belt are to repeat thrice these words of the "Harmony Key": "I will envy no man his good fortune but, instead, tell myself that what he has done is another proof of possibilities for myself." The directions continue:

> You will then sincerely and earnestly think the following and repeat three times, slowly and earnestly: "Fellow members, I send to you the full strength of my mental influence, with the command that it create in you new hope, courage, and the power to overcome obstacles and attract to you the success you merit and desire." When you have finished sending out these thoughts, let your brain rest and become passive, so that the influence of the members may come to you. It will come as a feeling of lightness, and hope will spring up within you, and the world will look brighter. After each treatment you will possess new energy and strength and will start upon your work again with a feeling of pleasure and determination to rise to the top and be an honor to yourself and to those who are using their efforts to assist you.

As all the members of the "Success Club" throughout the world are supposed to use the foregoing formulas at the same moment, "the perfect unity of thought will bring all into perfect harmony"; hope, confidence and perseverance are instantly born in the minds of faithful members, and whatever they undertake has a brilliantly successful issue.

Marvelous as are the results guaranteed to follow the prescribed outlay of time and money on the part of the Success Club's members, a much greater marvel is the spectacle of a Catholic woman, presumably with a head on her shoulders, becoming not only a firm believer in this new form of charlatanism, but even a zealous promoter of the fraud. Twenty minutes passed in prayer each day, she would probably consider wasted, and $5.00 given every year to the St. Vincent de Paul Society, she would, perhaps, think foolishly squandered. She will solemnly observe, however, the "Law of Mentalism" and help enrich the canny founder of the Success Club. Plainly, the organization is a form of the "New Thought Movement," the wickedness and absurdity of which were exposed in our issue of December 26, 1914.

A Wretched Crime

CRIME is never a sign of respect for morality. Some Americans think it is; they punish a crime by committing a crime. That is bad enough; but worse yet, they reckon their hideous sin an act of virtue, thus putting the brand of inferior civilization on their community. Last year there were a number of such men; groups of them have a long list of lynchings to their credit. During the first seven months of the year there were three or four lynchings every month; during the last five months there were eight or nine. Tuskegee reports 52 such murders for the year; the Chicago Tribune, 54; the Crisis, 74. As usual, too, there were innocent men among the victims; but, then, blind passion seeks not justice, but blood, and blood it gets, and the blood is upon its head. For law and order are outraged, authority is flouted and God is scorned. What can come of such conditions? Not peace, surely; but race hatred and hard, brutalized hearts, fit for the consuming fire, far away from their victims, from those at least who were innocent. In the end the lyncher, not the lynched, may be the victim, and that for eternity.

Broad or Narrow?

A LEARNED professor of chemistry, explaining that iron became steel by being impregnated with carbon, went on to declare that a perfectly sharp razor would be one with a ridge of carbon atoms cresting its edge. Extravagant, you will say, though keen! But here is something more extravagant! There are people in this great world so narrow that if they walked on that razor they would not cut themselves. They have irons for feet, and the rest of their personality is in proportion. Is narrowness, then, so dread a vice as to strain thus the possibilities of hyperbole?

What is broadness? Broadness is an angel of the choir of freedom. The path of a bullet should be straight and narrow; the tracks of a street-car are straight and unyielding and offer no opportunity for meandering. Narrowness is a virtue in machinery. The broadness which induced a certain street-car driver to turn off the tracks and let a load of hay pass has found few imitators in the city where this fact is related, or anywhere else. Animals are fixed in their ways by instinct and by training, and with them, too, narrowness is a virtue. Science and all well-established truth are and must be narrow. A broad geometrician, a broad chemist, or the like, is a misnomer. It is not a virtue to consider that the moon is made of green cheese, but it is very broad ignorance. Every one except skeptics, and their latest offspring, idealists, pragmatists and creative-evolutionists, every one holds that truth is definite, restricting, limited, narrow. You can not walk the line of truth with the uncertainty which characterized that Irish reveler who, in trying to make his native town, was more concerned, he said, with the width of the road than with its length. Broadness is a virtue where there is freedom to expand or contract. You can and ought to be broad where principles are not evident, where precepts are not clearly obligatory, where practice is not definitely prescribed.

Your theorist should be broad. He has indeed his answers to a certain problem, but until he knows his answer is right he is narrow if he imposes his theory tyrannically upon all. The narrow theorist is really the enemy of truth and of science. If he goes further and tries to answer all questions by his formula, then he becomes a faddist. If he is persistent and peculiar with his fad, then he will be said to be riding a hobby, and a hobby-horse is narrow longitudinally as well as latitudinally; it has the magnificent area of a point. Be broad in the matter of fads and fashions and fancies; be narrow if you have facts.

Broadness is a blend of humility, common-sense, unselfishness, magnaminity and sympathy. A man should not be broad on the Ten Commandments. They are clear, definite obligations. But if laws are narrow, love and mercy are broad, and no one should arrogate to himself the wisdom and power of Mount Sinai and hurl new tables of self-made laws at the heads of his neighbors. Spirit is broad, but flesh and appetite are narrow. Narrowness is short-sighted selfishness. To look for the trade-mark, "Made in Mylandia," may be good business, but it is not broadness if nationalism or sectionalism or localism or domesticism will allow one to approve of nothing unless it has "Made in Mylandia" stenciled upon it. Your clock may sometimes tick so loud at night that you imagine it is telling time for the antipodes, the solar apogee or stellar space. It isn't. See a neurologist.

Alas, during war-time, broadness is cribbed, cabined and confined. Acts, words, decisions, appreciations, tastes, go down into dark, cramped trenches. Standards and judgments are so narrow that pin-points afford ample space upon which to have them enjoy free exercise. Even Christianity with difficulty escapes the national brand. Some, no doubt, would be glad to haul down the Star of Bethlehem and confine its broad rays to one mountain or one city. Not, however, on Garizim of Samaria, or in Jerusalem only are found adorers in spirit and truth. Let spirit and truth see to it that there be no blockade zone to the noble virtue of broadness, that even under martial law freedom shall still be free and Catholicism remain steadfastly Catholic.

LITERATURE

A Fallen Angel

WITH the exception of Tennyson, no English writer has lived to taste the rare kind of literary fame so long as Mr. Thomas Hardy. In the eighties Coventry Patmore referred to him in the Fortnightly as "our first English novelist." Tolstoy, in far-away Russia, looked upon him as England's greatest literary genius. Articles innumerable, accepting him as a classic, have been appearing in serious magazines for more than a generation. Poets especially, most exacting critics, have acknowledged his charm, from Lionel Johnson in the early nineties, who wrote his only book on Mr. Hardy, to Mr. Lascelle's Abercrombie, whose critical study, a portly volume, appeared about two years ago.

Mr. Hardy is now seventy-five years old; and neither an old man's desire for rest nor the comforts of life in his country seat, Max Gate, near Dorchester, the "Casterbridge" of his Wessex tales, have won him from strenuous literary activity. Apparently he does not believe that old age can find any solace in an idle and complacent retrospect over a career sprinkled plentifully with enviable successes. Starting life as an architect and antiquarian, he turned novelist; and without straying for experience or material beyond the single county of Dorset, a place of farms and sleepy old towns, he became in a few years the literary rival of such accomplished and cosmopolitan masters in fiction as Meredith and Henry James, outstripping them in popularity. Then, when life is supposed to be on the decline, Mr. Hardy, at the climax of his fame as a novelist, cast the instruments of his fine prose aside and said, "Go to! I will be a poet." For the last seventeen years it has been almost nothing but poetry at the rate of a volume every two or three years from "Wessex Poems" in 1898, down to the recently published "Satires of Circumstances." (Macmillan.)

This we believe, is an unparalleled phenomenon in literary history. It is most unusual for a man of sound judgment to take to the making of poems late in life; and the experiment is almost sure to be painful to beholders. Could it be that Coventry Patmore was unconsciously responsible for Mr. Hardy's bold departure from precedent? Far back in 1875 we find Patmore writing as follows to Mr. Hardy about one of the latter's recent novels: "I regretted at almost every page that such almost unequaled beauty and power should not have assured themselves the immortality which would have been confirmed upon them by the form of verse." Was a seed dropped here? The question may interest some future biographer of Mr. Hardy.

Viewing the matter solely as one of art, the change is to be regretted. Many will regard Patmore's suggestion as fruitful and unfortunate. It is not easy, however, to come to conclusions about Mr. Hardy's verse. Undoubtedly it has poetic excellence of a sort hard to define. It is rugged and rough, with little or no sense of word-magic or of the subtler functions of rhythmic phrase and cadence. But it is honest work, such as an able architect might be fancied to like as well as to turn out; not devoid of beauty and character. Still its beauty is not the natural flower of genius; it never triumphantly eludes the suspicion of being a forced growth. Mr. Hardy, poet, is like an awkward and clumsy athlete who surprises you by his success. He seems to win the prize from his competitors by making sheer will and muscle supply the deficiencies of natural grace and aptitude. One can not entirely get rid of the conviction that Mr. Hardy is a poetic craftsman of originality and resource; at the same time one marvels that there should be a shred of such conviction.

But there is a more serious objection against the poetic art of Mr. Hardy than the doubtful genuineness of its outward expression, of its visible body. The spirit of his art, its vitality, its very breath, is diseased. If his unexpected and late appearance as a poet was remarkable, more remarkable still was his sudden revelation of himself, "in the middle of the journey of his life," not only as a Julian, who hated "the Galilean," but as a modern Lucretius, who delighted in public hurlings of defiance against God. Mr. Hardy's novels of the nineties are unequaled for their combination of artistic honesty and moral dishonesty. They are briefs against the Almighty. This is bad enough. But the wickedness is aggravated by the cunning tricks of a pettifogging lawyer who will allow no scruple to keep him from making his case more plausible. It is strange that no one has called attention to the sleight-of-hand chicanery in the moral argument of those books. The philosophy of Mr. Hardy's later novels has been carried over into his poetry and elaborated fully in his dramatic epic, "The Dynasts." It lifts its head in his recent volume and is a baleful presence.

Like most poetic expounders of anti-Christian philosophy, Mr. Hardy is shifty and difficult of definite classification in his beliefs. He is a monist, a Haeckel dressed up in art and emotion. He holds the universe to be the blind evolution of a primal unintelligent Force: this world is an unfortunate place for a sensitive and aspiring human being, who is sure to be crushed and flattened by the steam-rollers of a supreme, unseeing Will.

> Stand ye apostrophizing that
> Which, working all, works but thereat
> Like some sublime fermenting vat
> Heaving throughout its vast content
> With strenuously transmutive bent
> Though of its aim unsentient?

This is intelligible, and we understand why Mr. Hardy is bitterly dissatisfied with such an arrangement of things. But what we do not understand at all is the strange fact that Mr. Hardy vents his bitterness in spiteful little outbursts against the Christian God, Whom he declares to be non-existent. Is he in the fearful spiritual condition of those whose lot is > Half the Devil's lot.

> Trembling, but believing not?

Most of Mr. Hardy's satanic hatred expresses itself indirectly in harsh criticism of creation. Hence he is by sad eminence the Prince of Pessimists. In a poem of his latest volume, one who has just been buried, asks, "Who is digging on my grave?" Not her husband: he has already wedded another. Not her dearest kin: they regard flower-planting on a grave as foolish sentiment. It is her little dog.

> Ah, yes! You dig upon my grave . . .
> Why flashed it not on me
> That one true heart was left behind!
> What feeling do we ever find
> To equal among human kind
> A dog's fidelity!

In the next and concluding stanza we are informed that the dog was merely planting a bone for future emergencies! Mr. Hardy is never more gleeful or more enthusiastic in his work than when he is laying powder-trains to your gentler illusions. What a disagreeable old man he is!

And what a shocking old man! Like most popular writers, whose pleasure it is to drop what they fondly suppose to be scientific shrapnel upon our spiritual cathedrals, he betrays a mean fascination for sexual abnormalities He likes to come back to and hover over bestial carrion. He is not erotic, but displays eroticism, and broken marriage vows interest him keenly. Chaucer and Dryden bemoaned in their late manhood this sin of their passionate youth; in his old age Mr. Hardy revels in the sin. And yet we should not be surprised. Samuel Taylor Coleridge has told us: "The belief of a God and a future state (if a passive acquiescence may be flattered with the name of belief) does not always beget a good heart, but a good heart so naturally begets the belief that the very few exceptions must be regarded as strange anomalies from strange and unfortunate circumstances." Mr. Hardy's sneaping and snooping in the moral rubbish of life makes it difficult for us to include him with certainty among those exceptions; and we are sincerely sorry. For the "lord of the Wessex coast and all the lands thereby" had it in him to be an angel of light. "I would give my hand," Robert Louis Stevenson is quoted as saying, "to write like Hardy." Yet Stevenson's art bids fair to outlive Mr. Hardy's. So potent is the spirit-animating art.

A Playmate of Philip II. Being the History of Don Martin, of Aragon, Duke of Villahermosa, and of Doña Luisa de Borgia, His Wife. By LADY MORETON. With Seventeen Illustrations. New York: John Lane. $3.00.

Lady Moreton, the translator of Padre Coloma's "Story of Don John of Austria," reviewed in AMERICA for May 31, 1913, has here done some original work in Spanish biography. For she found in the ancestral archives of the Villahermosas, "the first of the eight families of Aragon," material for an interesting life of Don Martin de Guerrea y Aragón, Count of Ribagorza, Duke of Villahermosa. As he was one of the pages attending Charles the Fifth's little son, the subject of this biography can be safely styled, no doubt, "A Playmate of Philip II," but in after life, instead of being intimate, the two wrangled in the law courts over some property and the king signed the death warrant of Don Martin's son who had committed murder.

In 1542, when Don Martin was only sixteen, he was married to a lady twice his age, Doña Luisa Borgia, the austere sister of that Francis Borgia who made the "grand refusal" and died General of the Jesuits. The match proved happier, however, than was to be expected. Through the young duke was away from home a great deal on the king's business, the duchess, being a very capable woman, governed admirably, meanwhile, her husband's turbulent vassals and managed his estates with shrewdness. Indeed on returning home for good, after a five years' absence, Don Martin found everything in so satisfactory a condition that he urged Doña Luisa to continue her stewardship. She begged to be excused, however, saying "God has made man and not woman head of the family." No suffragette, she! Doña Luisa also succeeded, apparently, in getting St. Ignatius to send her Jesuit brother to Saragossa, that she might consult him there about her progress in perfection.

When Prince Philip went to England in 1554 to marry Mary Tudor, Don Martin was in the royal suite. The duke writes with what emotion he saw the great kingdom restored to Catholic unity. But this reconciliation with Rome lasted, he notes, but a short time, owing "to the sins of the world and by the hidden judgments of God. The greatest pity. With my own eyes I saw the conversion and the whole ecclesiastical state change, and divine service restored, and fourteen heretics burned in London. All this was undone, as God did not give these princes children." Don Martin took part in Philip's campaigns in France and Flanders and through Lady Moreton's pages move many of the notables of those stirring times, such as Alva, Granvella, Perez, and Christina of Denmark.

Left a widower at thirty-three with six children, the Duke prudently married again, occupied himself with his "Discourses" on Roman coins and antiquities, won the title, the "Philosopher of Aragon," died in 1581, and his shroud, as he desired, was a Cistercian habit. Don Martin's entire life, however, was not so edifying as his death, and Doña Luisa had her trials. But being both sensible and holy she removed her husband's temptations without losing his love. "A Playmate of Philip II" gives an interesting picture of the life led by the Spanish aristocracy of the sixteenth century. W. D.

King Albert's Book. New York: Hearst's International Library Co. $1.50.

Less than a year ago it was decided, beyond all uncertainty, by those who knew—and by a great many more who did not know—that the Catholic nation was decadent. Protestantism meant progress, and progress meant commercial prosperity. Then, all on the instant, there rang throughout the world the word "Belgium," and somehow since then accepted ideas have lost their value. Now Belgium was progressive, she was commercially prosperous, she was and is Catholic: that is, she lost everything that was counted worth having according to the standards of the every-day world, the Faith alone she has left. From all classes large sums of money have poured in to help Belgium in her need, and now there is presented to us a permanent memorial to Belgium and her gallant king in the form of "King Albert's Book." That the whole of the publishers' profits will go to the relief of the Belgians is the least of the reasons for buying the book, its value as literature but the smallest part of its intrinsic worth. To purchase the book is to be allowed to offer a tribute to this little stricken Catholic nation, to its homeless, landless, war-worn Catholic king; more royal in the day of his affliction than in the splendid robes of majesty.

This is the thought of those who have contributed to make the book. Their Eminences Cardinals Gibbons, Luçon, Amette and Bourne; statesmen like ex-President Taft, Sir Edward Grey and the Hon. Joseph Choate; authors like Mrs. Alice Meynell, M. Réne Bazin and Mr. Gilbert K. Chesterton; Catholics and non-Catholics from America, England, Ireland, Norway, Russia, Italy, France, Sweden, Poland, Holland, Spain, Japan and Denmark; artists, musicians, poets and dramatists have all counted it a privilege to lay of their best at the feet of Belgium; have, as with one accord, killed for ever the monstrous lie that the Catholic nation is decadent. In the years to come, when the last great war shall have become a memory, and the world shall enjoy the blessings of universal peace, "King Albert's Book" will keep fresh the remembrance of that noble king and of the loyalty of his people; and wherever the book shall be found, there also will be a permanent memorial of names and deeds "familiar on the lips as household words." Are We Ready? By H. D. Wheeler. Boston and New York: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.50.

This is a rapid-firing book, aimed with deadly accuracy at such pacificists and other un-Americans as are satisfied with the present military conditions of the United States. Shooting forth literary shrapnel in great variety and quantity, it will make pleasant reading, for readers who are outside the firing line—whether it compels conviction is another matter. Briefly, Mr. Wheeler demonstrates that our 90,000 soldiers, but half of whom are available for home service, and our scanty and inferior arms and ammunition, and our small and inefficient navy, are utterly inadequate to repel invasion by any first-class power. A million or half a million patriots could not spring to arms for they would have no arms to spring to, nor would they know how to handle them if they had. Our navy would be scattered, sunk or "bottled-up," and all our coast cities would be in the hands of the enemy, and holocausts of patriots slaughtered before the rest could be trained and armed for effective resistance. Ex-Secretary of War Stimson and several military experts indorse this pessimistic estimate, and the proofs that much of our $90,000,000 military expenditure is directed to "pork-barrel" purposes need no endorsement. Thomas Jefferson, W. H. Taft, General Wood and Woodrow Wilson are cited in support of the author's demand that we have more and better ships and guns and fighting men and military practice. For this purpose he would have us adopt "the German military idea" of citizen soldiers, "which is more democratic than ours," and abandon the merely professional system of Frederick the Great, which is now maintained only "by the British, ourselves and China, of the world's great nations." The extension of military camps to all educational institutions, and the coordination of an enlarged militia with the regular army, would supply the men and the training, while the Government should bend all its powers to provide an adequate reserve of guns, ammunition and supplies. Strong in constructive and destructive analysis and written to be read, the book will serve a useful purpose in as far as it stimulates interest in the question of rational defence. M. K.

Angela's Business. By Henry Sydnor Harrison. With Illustrations by Frederic R. Gruger. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. $1.35.

Those who have enjoyed reading "Queed" and "V. V.'s Eyes," the excellent novels this painstaking author has written, will take up eagerly "Angela's Business." Charles King Garrott, the hero, is an unsuccessful novelist who fancies that he thoroughly understands Woman, both the Old and the New. But Angela Flower, a type of the first, and Mary Wing, representing the second, show him before the story ends that he has a vast deal to learn on the subject. Mr. Harrison's description of the Redmantle Club and of Miss Hodger, "who admitted homes only as places to get into," is a delicious satire on "social workers," and Uncle Oliver's views on marriage are thoroughly orthodox, for he says:

> When a woman jumps up and hits a crack at marriage, that the rest of us are sacrificin' ourselves to build up for the good of society, why, she's a bad woman, you can talk till you're black in the face, that had ought to be punished. Yes, and those that help her, they're lending encouragement to the enemies of the Republic, seems like, and they'd ought to be punished too.

Angela, who found being a good daughter and sister business enough for any woman, does not permit absorption in those duties to keep her from pursuing with a little Fordette the man she thinks would make a good husband, and Mary Wing, whom the reader may not like at first, turns out very "womanly" after all. Mr. Harrison's amusing sketch of the aspiring author is doubtless rich in autobiographical data. W. D.

Just Stories. By Gertrude M. O'Reilly. New York: The Devin-Adair Co.

Read here, you heavy-hearted, and you will be "hanging your coat on a sunbeam" with a cry of delight and will sing songs to yourselves as sweet as a bird and run dancing into the air. And you, advancing and retreating army of commuters and travelers, if you begin these Irish tales with such exuberant joy, you will end by learning how to shorten the longest road. "These little stories," says the author, "give some little glimpse of Ireland to those who have not had the joy of looking on her face." The perfume of flowers and hues of the hills and music of the waters and the light of the fire, and Brideen and Johneen and Micheen, with match-making and priests and peelers and old saints and modern sinners, they are all there. It is not "Just Stories," but "Just Ireland." It is too bad to have to choose where all is good, but if any one wants to know where to find laughs enough to carry him to the Pacific Exposition while thinking he was crossing the street, let him read "The New Inkybator." In some dainty introduction verses, J. M. S. calls the book a "little whiff of country air." Whiff? Why, 'tis a gale of merry laughter, shot through, now and then, with a fine spray of tears. The greatest fault of this book is its length. It is entirely too short. F. P. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

February's six "best-sellers": "The Turmoil," "The Lone Star Ranger," "The Eyes of the World," "Mr. Grex of Monte Carlo," "The Patrol of the Sun Dance Trail," and "The Clarion," have already been noticed in AMERICA. Booth Tarkington's protest against materialism deserves its place at the head of the list; the besmirched "dime novel" that comes next will benefit nobody; the "persistent popularity" of "The Eyes of the World" begins to be amusing; and of the last three novels mentioned, "The Clarion" is the only one that rises above the commonplace.

Miss Georgina Pell Curtis, the editor of the "American Catholic Who's Who," which was published in 1911 has received from all parts of the country inquiries about a second edition. She regrets, however, that there is no prospect at present of bringing it out. Though the widely advertised first edition numbered but 2,500 copies, only some 1,500 copies were sold. The time and labor spent in compiling the book covered a period of over two years and the cost to both editor and publisher far exceeded any profit. If the Catholics of the United States had bought up the first edition, a second edition, with corrections, improvements and additions would have been possible. The editor would be only too glad to bring the book out every two years, but that is out of the question, for plainly there is no demand for the book.

Benziger Bros. have placed upon the market a medium-sized, 18mo edition of the "Breviarium Romanum." (Turonibus, Typis A. Mame et Filiorum.) The Mame or Tours breviary has long been a favorite with many priests. The new edition is approved by the Sacred Congregation of Rites as conformable with the Roman editio typica of March 25, 1914. It is printed in neat, clear type, more attention having been given to spacing than to the largeness of the type itself. Completeness has always been the special aim of the editors of the Mame breviary and this virtue is not wanting here. References are as few as is practicable for the handy, portable size of the book. Thus the responsoria are given after the lessons of the nocturns where only a reference occurred before. The price of the breviary is $9.75 and with a proprium added, $10.75.

Harold Begbie, the zealous Protestant church worker, does not seem to have been just the man to write an "up-to-the-minute" sketch of "Kitchener, Organizer of Victory" (Houghton, $1.25), that would please the "pro's." The author undertakes to discredit the popular legend of "the man who has made himself a machine," the general "who has no age but the prime of life, no body but one to carry his mind." Mr. Begbie maintains that Kitchener is no genius, and not at all bloodless; he is "a slow, thorough, painstaking, laborious and determined organizer." The author finds in England's Secretary of War, however, considerable "Prussianism" and offers as an example of it the answer Kitchener gave a young engineer who had done incredible things to have a bridge finished on the day the General desired:

> At the moment when Kitchener arrived the engineer had everything ready for the inspection. His eyes shining with pleasure, his face wet with perspiration, his hands still grimed with the anxious work of last touches, he advanced to Kitchener, saluted, and said, with a smile: "Well, Sir, we've just managed to do it in time." The only answer he received, the dreadful eyes fixed upon him, the voice cold with authority, was this: "Yes, but you ought not to appear before me unshaved."

Eight portraits illustrate Mr. Begbie's "popular" account of Kitchener's military career.

Let no one take up Edward P. Buffet's "The Layman Revato" (The Author, Bergen Avenue, Jersey City) in order to while away the time. The thoughtful student will be interested by the wealth of learning brought to bear upon the imagined mental processes of the hero. "Revato" is conceived to be under contrary influences, Buddhistic and Hellenistic, three centuries before Christ, in the land of the sacred stream of Ganges. He is strongly Buddhistic in temperament, but boldly ventures into the realm of Hellenistic philosophy. His mind has been trained to lead the will in the strong traces of restraint; he cuts the traces and gives free fling to the will to follow the emotions. The writer would have done a better work, if all his erudition had been expended upon a scientific study of the Buddhistic mind of the period. As things are here presented to the reader, they are a veritable tangle of ideas; Buddhistic, Hellenistic, Christian. Needless to say, only a neo-Buddhist will admit the ideas of "Revato."

"The World Crisis and the Way to Peace" (Putnam, $0.75) by E. Ellsworth Shumaker, Ph.D., is an impassioned plea to Americans to bring about a cessation of hostilities. The recipe suggested is this: Appropriate $20,000,000 for Red Cross work; secure a month's truce; through the "Church Universal" pray unceasingly to God; appeal to the mothers of the world; call a counsel of neutral nations. But if these measures prove ineffective, the author would have us send half the United States navy to the North Sea! "The Origins of the War" (Putnam, $1.00) by J. Holland Rose, Litt.D., is another book on what is now a well-worn subject. Under the captions: "Anglo-German Rivalry (1875-1888)," "The Kaiser," "Germany's World-Policy," "Morocco," "The Bagdad Railway," "Alsace-Lorraine," "The Eastern Question (1908-1913)," "The Crisis of 1914," "The Rupture," the author traces from an Englishman's view-point, the course of the political developments out of which the present conflict has arisen.

In "A History of the Commandments of the Church" (Herder, $1.50), Father A. Villien, of the Catholic University of Paris, has written a valuable book. Beginning from Apostolic times, he shows the origin and growth of the different precepts that we find to-day in the catechism of Pius X grouped under five heads. The first complete catalogue of these Church laws he assigns to the fifteenth century, but the obligation of assisting at Sunday Mass was acknowledged certainly as early as the fourth century. The author's method of treating his subject is never to build on conjecture, but to prove all his statements by such reliable documents as pastorals addressed to clergy and laity, decrees of councils and the writings of the churchmen of the period in question. The moralist and canonist, as well as the ecclesiastical student, will find in this book stores of valuable information regarding the Church's laws.

"The Columbiad," by William H. Sheran (J. M. Dent & Sons, London, 1s., 6d.), is a poem in six books of heroic verse. Some good descriptive passages mark the work, and a great deal of prosaic narrative, too. On the whole the epic effort is weak. There is a lack of unity, and the reader is left at the end of the poem with America undiscovered and Columbus still at sea. How this tribute to the great Genoese will make his deeds more real to the youth of America and England, as the author hopes, is not at all clear. The book is dedicated to the Knights and admirers of Columbus throughout the world.——"Stories for Carmencita" (Brooklyn Eagle Press) were written in Spanish by Salvador Calderon for his little daughter, and translated by A. G. Gahan in the hope of the book's reaching other little children here in America. "Your mother who dwells in heaven and in my heart wished me to write this book for you," is the author's very simple introduction. In their original Spanish setting the stories may read simply enough, but certainly for American children many a phrase in the English version will prove puzzling. The translator has held too much to the Spanish idiom.

The Merrymount Press of Boston, has issued Pico della Mirandola's "A Platonick Discourse Upon Love" ($3.00). The format of the book leaves nothing to be desired, paper, print, binding, being in exquisite taste. The contents of the volume constitute an interesting literary curiosity for the enjoyment of the more scholarly. Even these will find in the book much that is puzzling, a great deal that is outworn and some few false notions which are now experiencing a renascence in literature and philosophy.

"Chemistry of Common Things" (Allyn & Bacon, $1.50), will be especially welcomed by those who have to train their pupils to meet the Regents' requirements. When the book's authors, several years ago, framed the syllabus in chemistry for New York State, they found few, if any, elementary chemistries that contained all the information that the syllabus called for. Hence they set to work and produced "First Principles of Chemistry" to meet the want. The present book may be regarded as a supplement to the former volume although it can itself be used as a text-book in elementary chemistry. There are two parts to the book; in the first will be found some of the things common to all elementary chemistries, but with additions on topics of practical interest, chief among them, the chapter on food-values. The second part gives the book its distinctive feature, for here has been gathered a wealth of information in interesting chapters on the chemistry of most of the substances which make up our every-day industrial and technical life. Lime, cement, iron, steel, paints, oils, dyes and textile materials, to say nothing of such processes as cooking, adulteration of food, bread, butter and cheese-making, cleaning and laundering, all find a place in this "Chemistry of Common Things."

EDUCATION

From Sixty to Six Hundred

THIS is a story of growth; an exemplification in miniature of the Gospel mustard seed which, from a tinyness almost invisible, came to be a shelter for a great family of the sky's winged throng. In our narrative, the hearts of little children are the field, the word of God is the seed, the ministry of devoted catechists is the sower, and the St. Ambrose Sunday School with its roll of six hundred child enthusiasts, developed from a tiny nucleus of sixty, is the grown and sheltering tree.

The Field

St. Ambrose parish is in the southwest corner of St. Louis, and comprises a slightly elevated section of territory, locally known as "Dago Hill." A combination of natural landscape features and industrial activities isolates this area from the rest of residential St. Louis and, as the nickname indicates, it is inhabited almost exclusively by Italians. The colony numbers about five thousand souls. The men are chiefly employed in the clay mines, and brick, tile and terra cotta factories which hem in the settlement. Several hundred women and girls work in a neighboring tobacco factory, close to the "Hill," and a very few go down into the city for employment.

The religious care of this settlement is in charge of a zealous Italian priest, Father Carotti. Finding himself overtaxed by a multitude of obligations, some years ago he asked the theological students of St. Louis University to come to his aid by organizing and conducting a Sunday school for the children, and the Sunday school is now in its tenth year. The beginning gave but feeble promise of success. The word Sunday school had no attraction for the children. Many of the parents who were urged from the altar to send their little ones disregarded the admonition, and of course the many other parents who were not at Mass to hear the announcement were still more indifferent. To get the children for instruction was clearly an important problem to be solved.

The Method

A simple expedient for gathering a large crowd of children in a district of the poor is to dispense, with a liberal hand, pretty pictures and other attractive gifts. However this method of securing an audience, whose continued attendance and attention will depend largely upon the character of the purchase price offered, is of very doubtful value to the end and purpose of a Catholic Sunday school. It creates an entirely wrong attitude of mind in the children. They come to think that they are doing a favor to the priest or their teacher by taking an interest in the learning of their catechism, attendance at Mass and religious matters generally.

The founders of the work on "Dago Hill" did not desire any such dubious success. They deliberately abstained from coaxing the little ones to come to Sunday school. They chose rather to await with patience the growth that would result from the influence of their work upon the few who were faithful in attending from the start. They strove first to instil into the boys and girls a sense of genuine personal responsibility in the matter of religious knowledge and observance, and then to interest them in an apostolic way in their fellows. This may seem a pretentious undertaking, but experience in this instance, as in many another, has proved that the apostolic capabilities of little children far surpass the expectations of their elders. No effort was made to excuse the obvious religious neglect so prevalent among their adult relatives and friends. The teachers referred to this sad neglect often and pointedly because of its danger to the little ones as a perennial scandal. They were told that they should work to free their parents and friends from this great misfortune, just as they would labor night and day to relieve them of some mortal malady.

THE HARVEST

The expedient worked admirably. The original half hundred little ones began gradually to bring in recruits, who in turn became workers; and at the end of the first year the Sunday school claimed seventy-five or eighty thoroughly interested adherents, unwilling to miss Mass, because that would displease their Father in heaven; pleased to learn more about His plans for their happiness; anxious to win back to the practice of Catholicism their grown-up relatives and to enlist their youthful fellows in the ranks of the Sunday school.

Growth in numbers continued to be slow for several years, but the interest and regularity of those who came, and the notable improvement in their ways, was a surety all sufficient that permanent good was being effected; and one could look with confidence for that larger growth that would bring under the school's influence the several hundred little ones whom the sad circumstance of parental carelessness left without proper religious instruction.

The decrees of the late Holy Father on early and frequent Communion, not only made possible more effective work among the children, but gave a wonderful acceleration to the Sunday school's growth in numbers. The spectacle of the little ones crowding the Communion railing Sunday after Sunday caused pronounced wonderment in their grown-up brethren, and the resulting inquiries led to a new and more general interest in the school. Many hitherto apathetic adults began to send the little ones, and the increasing crowd of children trooping gayly to and from the church every Sunday afternoon could not escape the notice of even the most indifferent. Several years ago it became necessary to enlarge the staff of teachers, and requests were made to various sodality organizations in the city to send catechists. The response was generous, and at the present time our six hundred children are taught by forty catechists.

INCIDENTAL RESULTS

The policy, originally adopted, of developing loyalty from within, rather than purchasing it by presents, has never been abandoned; and the test of experiment has only accentuated its wisdom. It is a rule of the Sunday school that presents, of any sort, may be given but three times a year, Christmas, Easter and June, at the close of school. At these times only simple inexpensive gifts are allowed. One evidence of the children's enthusiasm for their Sunday school is their manifest reluctance to have a Sunday drop out, even at Christmas or Easter time. During the vacation season classes are not conducted, but last summer one of the catechists announced that he would visit the "Hill" on the Sunday before the First Friday to remind the children of their Communion day. To the catechist's glad surprise nearly four hundred boys and girls gathered at the church to meet him.

The children show great reverence for their teachers, and as is natural, become much attached to them. No small amount of the good accomplished is the result of the informal association of teachers and pupils before and after class. The candid and unceremonious friendship of these men and women, who come a great distance at considerable inconvenience simply to assist the little Italians, is a powerful influence for the elevation of children's ideals.

The Sunday school has exerted, moreover, notable influence in revivifying religious practical piety in the adult portion of the settlement. This result is evidenced both by a better attendance at divine service, and an increased frequentation of the sacraments. At the Christmas and Easter seasons especially, the little ones are urged to pray and plot to bring some negligent adult to Mass and the sacraments. Their happy narratives of success are as consoling as the necessity for their special endeavors is pathetic.

FUTURE WORKERS

One of the most consoling evidences of good wrought by the school, is the fact that among those who have graduated from the classes of instruction, many are willing and anxious to help in the work of teaching. At present more than a dozen young ladies of the settlement itself are conducting prayer classes. This personal prominence enlarges the influence of their every-day example, and gives them a consciousness of spiritual dignity and responsibility that is at once a strong protection, and a guarantee of continued fidelity.

SOCIOLOGY

A Grim Fairy Tale

MRS. JEREMIAS TENEMENT was suffering from a bad attack of nerves. A few weeks back, she would have called it "feeling all washed out." But she had lately discovered her nerves at the personal hygiene class in the Sweetness and Light Center, and the discovery had been epoch-making for the Tenement family.

"Is it nerves again?" queried the master of the house.

"It is," snapped Mrs. Tenement. "The ladies at the Center say I need rest."

"You might begin with your tongue," suggested her lord, whose eyes sometimes belied his meek mouth.

Mrs. Tenement's sense of humor was more than feminine. So she hurried on.

"I need rest and a change of point of view. That's what the ladies say. I should be interesting myself in the great world around me, helping to make it brighter and better. Them's their very words. I should be allowed to take my mind off my own narrow spear—sphere—and find recreation in doing good to others."

A SOCIOLOGIZED FAMILY

Mr. Tenement's retentive memory recalled two facts: first, that he was listening to that identical speech for the third time; and second, that he cherished an emphatic grudge against the Sweetness and Light Center. To begin with, it was non-sectarian, whatever that might be, and as Mr. Tenement put it, not his kind at all, at all. Besides, he was just a bit weary of the endless quotations from Mrs. Mansion and her Center, used by Mrs. Tenement who belonged to the Hygiene Class; by Maggie, his eldest, who belonged to the Domestic Science Circle; by Mike, who was a leader on the basketball squad; by Paul, Will and Bertie, who made paper futilities in the kindergarten, and by Henry who was occasionally loaned to the Day Nursery. Hence the oft-repeated complaint of Mrs. Tenement gave impetus to his cerebrations, for suddenly a smile wrinkled his sun-scorched face:

"'Tis rest and change you need, sure enough, and a chance to make your fellow-man better. Then why not take 'em all in to-day? Visit your Mrs. Mansion." Mr. Tenement scowled momentarily, as he recalled how she had referred to him as a "specimen." "Ask her how she lives. That'll be a change for you. Give her some tips on how to raise her children; you've got four more than she. Find out if she goes to church regular, and if she says her prayers. 'Tis only fair, I say, to make some return for the intrust she's been takin' in us."

INVESTIGATING THE RICH

Mrs. Mansion was just finishing a paragraph in her new book, descriptive of the life of the denizens of McAvoy flats, and the self-sacrificing efforts of the wealthy to bring some culture into their lives, when the maid entered.

"Didn't I tell you that I could not see any one?" snapped the advocate of sweetness and light. "I am busy now and have no time——"

The heavy curtains parted and Mrs. Tenement bobbed into the room. Her smile would have gone straight to the heart of an iceberg.

"Forgive me for intruding upon your labors," she said in a tone perfectly imitative of Mrs. Mansion's "sociological voice," "but I could not resist the temptation to drop in. Tell me, how are you getting along?"

Before the astonished Mrs. Mansion could find breath to utter the thoughts that surged within her the phonograph continued:

"You know, I am so interested in the housing of the rich. One must have recreation and a change of point of view, and mine is doing good to others."

"Mrs. Tenement," began the astonished Mrs. Mansion, and her voice made one think of reindeer bells clinking over deserts of snow, "this is quite too much——"

"Not at all," interrupted her vocal counterpart, using expressions that rang familiar. "I enjoy it; it's a real pleasure. Besides"—and here Mrs. Tenement wore her own personality for a moment—"you told us at the Center to seek rest and a change of atmosphere and a chance to make the world better and brighter. So my man said, since you was always so interested in us, I ought to stop in and do something for you."

Mrs. Mansion reached faintly for something that was not there. Her smelling-salts, perhaps.

Making Home Comfortable

"Now this is a very nice room, so bright and cheery; but I don't like the way it's furnished. If I might suggest, them curtains is too heavy; they gather dust and dust is bad for the lungs. I learned that in the household class. Beautiful and useful; them's the qualities the teacher in the art class said everything should have. And these here chairs ain't exactly what you'd call comfortable. Have things comfortable, Mrs. Mansion, so that your old man will come to love his home, and won't——"

A generous application of smelling-salts had revived partly, Mrs. Mansion's stunned senses. Her teeth chattered after a manner which one might deem menacing.

"Why, what's the matter? I thought you'd like me to make suggestions. I wasn't put out when you said horrid things about our wax fruit and the plush sofa. Be sweet and cheery. And how's the little ones?"

Mrs. Mansion's hand was reaching wildly for the bell, but it paused in mid-air, as Mrs. Tenement leaned forward in her chair, and in a hoarse whisper asked:

"It ain't really true that you let a hired girl look after 'em? You do? Well, believe me, Mrs. Mansion, and I've got six of my own, no hired girl can take care of 'em right. They're always thinking about some feller or other, and goodness only knows when the baby's due to fall into the kitchen stove. And children will play in the kitchen."

"Have you come here with the express purpose of insulting me?" Mrs. Mansion's tone was an uncertain blend of hysteria, indignation and tears. She had met her match, a woman who could out-talk her. Waterloo seemed near.

Suggestions on Religion

"Why, no. But I thought a few pointers would make you brighter and better. There should be contact between the upper and the lower classes. That's what you told us. By the way, do you go to Mass regular?"

"Mass! Are you mad?"

"Well, of course, that's a sensitive point," soothed Mrs. Tenement. "Still, when a person hasn't been going to church, some friend ought to speak to her. Really, you ought to go to church. Your home would be happier, your children better cared for——"

Mrs. Mansion's hand had found the bell.

"Anne, show this woman to the door."

Mrs. Tenement's form grew suddenly limp.

"Why, Mrs. Mansion, you ain't really huffed, are you?"

As the Other Half Views It

The volume of Mrs. Mansion's eloquence flung itself at the defenceless intruder. "In all my life I have never seen such unblushing impertinence. To invade my house unasked, to criticize the style of my furniture and appointments, to tell me how my children shall be reared, to pass slighting comments on my husband and, most of all, to trifle with my religion, is an impudence I had not deemed even possible. Woman, leave my house as quickly as you can."

Mrs. Tenement's dumpy little figure stiffened with something of real dignity. When she spoke it was not with the strange blending of Mrs. Mansion's personality, but with all the force of her own honest soul.

"Oh, then, it is really a matter of a point of view. When you come to my house, without so much as 'by your leave,' make nasty remarks about my furniture, put foolish ideas into my children's heads, teach me to make dishes when I haven't the money to buy the stuff that goes into them, call my husband a specimen and say things that ain't true about my Church, that's sociology. But when I do the same to you, it's just impertinence. Maybe there's a difference, but somehow, it's mighty hard to see. I'm going, Mrs. Mansion, but what you said about me, is true of you, too. Me and my man and my children ain't like a bunch of animals for you and your kind to look over and study, and our flat ain't a zoo where you can come and take a morning off."

Pa's Plush Sofa

Mrs. Tenement was unwontedly silent that evening. She seemed to have forgotten that she had nerves. But when Mr. Tenement came home, she said in an audible whisper to Maggie, the eldest: "Go out to the woodshed and get Pa's plush sofa. He'll be wantin' it when he smokes his pipe after supper."

And Mr. Tenement, after supper, reclining on the restored plush sofa, winked a long, satisfied wink. He had done a good day's work.

Daniel A. Lord, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

According to statistics prepared in the State of Massachusetts, since 1880 private institutions in that State have received the sum of $16,508,029.19 from the appropriations of the legislature. Of this sum the House of the Good Shepherd received $9,000; the House of the Guardian Angel $2,208.54; Carney Hospital $30,000 which, together with some lesser appropriations, makes the total amount received by Catholic institutions $52,000. This total appropriation covering a term of thirty-five years averages under $1,500 yearly from the public treasury for Catholic charitable works, yet even so paltry a sum was sufficient to raise the ire of certain New Englanders, who surged into the Boston State House recently to support an amendment which would prohibit all appropriations, save under conditions both impertinent and inquisitorial.

Every now and then for the past three or four weeks certain New York papers have given space to hysterical letters in defence of an unfortunate but sinful woman who topped an unholy life by the murder of her children. The woman's plight is sad, no doubt, but adultery and murder are scarcely worthy of passionate rhetoric, however illogical. As for the "mere man" in the case: the world were better without him. The clamor against the District Attorney, Martin by name, who is determined to prosecute the criminals, is scandalous. Happily this public official appears to scorn attempts at intimidation. His ideals are high, his courage superb; both bespeak a man of lofty soul who knows his duty and dares do it. The community at large is indebted to him for his determination to make the aforesaid crimes costly and unpleasant proceedings. Should he succeed in carrying his resolve into effect, he will be reviled, but not by any one with civic pride and a sense of decency. All such will hail him as a benefactor and envy him his suffering in the cause of righteousness.

John Burroughs is not a physicist nor a chemist nor a biologist nor a philosopher, but just a plain, blunt man, with a love for squirrels and birds and other interesting creatures. He is at home with them, and writes delightfully about them. He is not at home with chemistry, nor with atoms either. Nevertheless he writes about them, not delightfully, however. In the current Yale Review, he says:

> Chemistry is all-potent. . . . a chemical mixture introduces an element of magic (!). No conjurer can approach such a transformation as that of oxygen and hydrogen gases into water. The miracle of turning water into wine is tame by comparison. . . . Truly chemistry works wonders; it is almost omnipotent. . . . It is such progress as this that leads some men of science to believe that the creation of life itself is within the reach of chemistry. I do not believe that any occult or transcendental principle bars the way, but that some unknown and perhaps unknowable condition does, as mysterious and unrepeatable as that which separates our mental life from our physical. The transmission of the physical into the psychical takes place; but the secret of it we do not know.

The amiable but unscientific Mr. Pecksniff, in his extreme youth, believed that pickled onions grew on trees: there is nothing, therefore, to prevent another amiable, unscientific man, even though he be very old, from believing that the creation of life is within the reach of chemistry, after he has formulated the dogma that chemistry is magical and all potent. "I believe in omnipotent chemistry," is Mr. Burroughs' creed. That is theological, and so science and theology are reconciled by five words, theology, of course, undergoing partial destruction in the process. And yet he is not sure of his creed. In one sentence his chemistry is all potent, in another almost omnipotent. Contradictories are reconciled here. No wonder that, in the amiable gentleman's view, "the miracle of turning water into wine," a fact above and beyond the supremest reaches of the natural law, is "tame in comparison" with the transformation of oxygen and hydrogen into water, a natural process subject to known laws. It is worthy of note, too, that Mr. Burroughs, according to his habit, speculates in uncertain tones for a page or more, and then from the purest kind of uncertain speculation jumps by one sentence into this absolute certitude: "The transmutation of the physical into the psychical takes place." There you have it, light from smoke. So science is made from contradictions and hazy speculation. And this from a review bearing the name of a great university!

Of late literature has been pouring in upon us from the Philippines. The story is as usual, sad neglect on the part of Catholics, shameless calumny on the part of a certain type of Protestant missioners. Judging from reports at hand, one Hanna has the reputation of being a very apostle of untruth. On the occasion of the celebration in thanksgiving for the restoration of the Jesuits he wrote in his paper:

> Last week here in Vigan the Jesuits celebrated the centenary of the permission granted them to live here in the Philippines, because they had been banished. Bishop Hurth did not take part in the celebration because he belongs to a different sect from the Fathers. Recently the Mexican government also expelled the Jesuits from Mexico.

Another paper Aguipadamag, whatever that means, after calling Hanna a "bold liar," proceeds to expose his shameless chicanery. The Philippine Observer, a Protestant magazine with a Methodist ring about it, reeks with wretched calumnies against the Church. Thus is the pure gospel spread among the simple people. AMERICA'S views about this matter coincide with those expressed by one Dr. W. T. Phillips, evidently a parson:

> Probably the meanest type of Christianity I have ever come across in the world is what I found at several points in the Orient, where missionaries of certain American sects, avoiding the difficulties of pioneer work among the heathen, have planted themselves in the midst of converts of older missions, and have undertaken to proselyte them for their particular tenents concerning immersion or some other peculiar sectarian distinction. Environed by all the opportunities of the non-Catholic world, and with their smallness rebuked by the presence of a great need, they yet do not hesitate to wean away from another missionary the fruit of many years of labor, all for the sake of some shibboleth. They call this foreign missions; instead it is one of the worst forms of domestic sectarianism transplanted to a foreign shore.

The "meanest type of Christianity" is progressing in the Philippines, because the apostles of untruth are more alert than the apostles of truth.

If reports be true, the Chancellor of the University of Kansas is apt to find himself in a quandary. Allowing for one or two statements with which we do not agree, he has given public expression to a very Catholic doctrine, a dangerous proceeding in these piping days of anti-Catholic agitation. He says:

> The war has shown that culture can not be depended upon as the sole basis of civilization. We believed intellectual development made men good, that schools and colleges and the spread of culture were all that was necessary. The smoking ruins of many cities and the terrible carnage of the Marne and the Aisne show how false is this assumption. . . . Christianity must end its divisions so it may speak with unity and authority, it must become a governing force in our economic and political system. . . . A united Christianity can end war. If Christianity had remained without division and there was one universal church then the head of the church whatever his office or title could have prevented the great war.

Precisely. There is a universal Church; many a time its head prevented war; his title is Pope; his office is Bishop of the Universal Church. All men are called by Christ to enter that Church, so that there will be but one fold and one Shepherd—one Lord, one faith, one baptism.

Catholic readers of the New York Sun must have enjoyed keenly the sound drubbing that paper recently gave the Rev. Dr. Randolph Harrison McKim, who in a "private" letter practically accused the Sun of being subsidized by the Kaiser. "Is this the same Dr. McKim who spoke in favor of the Menace and against the protest of the Catholics who wished it excluded from the mails?" asks a correspondent of the Sun.

> His attitude on that occasion was that he upheld the freedom of the press. He would wish no interference with such papers which systematically slander the Catholic Church, would give them all license, and yet he attacks the Sun for publishing Von Bernhardi's article, not confining its columns to articles from friends of the Allies, thus proving itself broad-minded by giving both sides of the war argument.

It is plain that Dr. McKim believes that the press should be perfectly free to attack causes and institutions that he detests but those he favors should of course be protected by a rigid censorship.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country, are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut division of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made

A Special Educational Rate

Applicable to Teachers and Students in Catholic Schools only.

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

NOW IN PRESS

Pioneer Laymen of North America

A new book by the Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J., telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne, and Radisson.

The many admirers of Father Campbell's historical works will find in these sketches companion pictures to his popular "Pioneer Priests of North America." They are condensed and somewhat rapid narrations of the lives of a number of men who were conspicuous in the days when civilization was being brought to this continent: explorers, founders of states and colonies, governors of provinces, commandants of forts, captains of vessels, officers of the regular army, leaders of the reckless coureurs de bois, daring traders who, in the interests of commerce, ventured alone among the savages, besides pirates, filibusters and peaceful colonists. They are mostly Frenchmen, or native-born Canadians, but there are a few Spaniards, an occasional Englishman, and towards the end, a distinguished man who is frequently put down as Scotch, but who constantly insisted on his Irish origin. A great State on the Pacific slope claims him as its founder. The field of their operations was extensive, for it stretched from ocean to ocean and from Hudson Bay as far south as Brazil.

Some of them are ideal heroes and may be proposed as models; the glory of others is sadly tarnished; and a few are subjects of reproach. From all, however, lessons of conduct may be learned, and, here and there, in the course of a narrative, it is possible to correct certain false appreciations of facts and motives which a class of biased writers have fastened on American history. The series is arranged chronologically so that the various sections connect more or less with one another.

CHRONICLE

The War.—In the west there has been little activity on either side, except for frequent artillery encounters. The British fleet shelled the towns on the seaboard, and the Germans attempted to advance in the direction of Nieuport, in neither case, however, with any notable results. The French have made a slight advance to the northwest of Reims. They have also pushed forward southeast of Verdun and west of Pont-a-Mousson, thus narrowing still further the already narrow strip of land that runs from Metz to St. Mihiel, which the Germans have defended so successfully for many months. Their progress in both cases has been very small, and is still far from threatening the German line of communication.

Bulletin, March 30, p. m.-April 6, a. m.

In Russia the general situation seems to be about the same. It is reported that the Germans are retiring to the west of the Niemen, and that their attempt to force back the Russian army before Grodno has not only failed, but may end in disaster. From this it would seem that whatever slight advantage has been gained along the East Prussian border has been on the side of the Russians. The principal event in this area of the war has been the abandonment by the Germans of the siege of Ossowetz. The capture of this place would have given the Germans important strategic advantages. It was the point selected by them for their principal effort to pierce the Russian line. West of Warsaw there has been comparative quiet. The same is true of southern Poland. In fact, operations at all points of the long line of battle in the east seem to have been subordinated to the great conflict that has been steadily going on with heavy losses to both sides in Galicia. Movements in other localities are probably only demonstrations and are attracting little attention.

Russia and Poland

The main interest in the war is at present focused on the Carpathians. Here the Russians are in possession of Bartfield and the Lupkow pass, and although they have not been able to make much progress during the week, they have captured Cisna and have straightened out their line between Mezo-Laborca and Lutowiska, and can now look down on the coveted Hungary. The key to the situation, however, is still in the hands of the Austrians, who continue to hold the Uzsok pass, where they have repulsed many vigorous attacks by the Russians. Both sides have been heavily reinforced and are fighting desperately under the most adverse conditions both of ground and weather. Petrograd is confident of soon reaching the plains of Hungary, but the invasion is far from being a fact. A great deal depends on the outcome of the struggle for the Uzsok pass. If the Austrians lose it, almost inevitably they will be forced to retire. If, on the other hand, they can press forward again down the foothills of the Carpathians into Galicia, the extreme right of the Russians will be placed in a precarious position, and will probably have to give way. Not only the Austrians, but the Germans, recognize the important consequences of a Russian victory in the mountains; and it is said that the decrease of German activity along the East Prussian boundary has its explanation in the fact that troops have been hurried south through Cracow.

The Carpathians

Further east the Austrians have been consolidating their hold on Bukowina by pressing forward from Czernowitz across the river Dniester into Russian territory. The Russians have succeeded in driving them back near Chotin. In the Dardanelles there have been no important developments. Neither has the bombardment of the Bosporus by the Russian fleet, which apparently has cleared the Black Sea of Turkish warships, resulted in any marked success. Adrianople, however, is being strengthened and Turkish troops are being moved to its defence, presumably as a precautionary measure against possible attacks by Bulgaria.

Bukowina and Turkey

The sinking of the British ship Falaba by a German submarine, after the passengers and crew had been warned to leave the vessel, but before they were able to do so, resulted in the death of more than 100 non-combatants. Among the passengers was a citizen of the United States. This fact falls within the strict accountability to which the American note declared our Government would hold the German authorities. While our State Department has taken cognizance of the event, and has instituted inquiries into the facts of the case, it is preserving a wise reticence, and is endeavoring to avoid any step that might inflame public opinion. The British authorities report that, during the week ending March 31, six steamers were sunk by German submarines, a seventh was torpedoed, but succeeded in reaching port. The total number of sailings recorded during the same period amounted to 1,559 vessels, either entering or leaving British ports.

Other Items

The investigations which have been instituted by the French authorities into the charge which has been brought against Raymond Swoboda, an American citizen, of having set fire to the steamship La Touraine, are still under way, and have not yet led to any decision. With regard to the case of the William Frye, which was sunk by the German commerce-destroyer, Prinz Eitel Friedrich, the United States has asked compensation from the German Government only for the loss of the vessel and the consequent damages to its owner. A note has been sent by our Government to Great Britain declaring that the blockade violates the sovereign rights of neutrals.

Bands of Bulgarian irregulars raided Serbia and Greece, but were repulsed. Serbia has sent a note of protest. The incident is not regarded as serious.

Austria-Hungary.—An official denial was made by Vienna of the reports from Petrograd that Austria was seeking a separate peace with Russia. Rumor after rumor has been set on foot against Austria since the very beginning of the war. At first the efficiency of the Austrian army was discredited, then Austria and Germany were persistently represented as at variance with each other, in spite of the harmonious cooperation of both Powers. For a long time thereafter Germany was pictured as disgracefully sacrificing her ally. Tables have now been turned and Austria is found willing to betray Germany. If the object of the press campaign is to set Germany and Austria at variance it will hardly achieve its purpose, though it has succeeded in placing Austria in a false light. In the same spirit the total economic collapse of Austria-Hungary has been retold hundreds of times since the outbreak of the war. In the meantime both Austria and Hungary, as recent figures show, are economically more sound than had been believed. According to Dr. Friedrich Fellner, the total national property of the Dual Monarchy amounts to 141,135 billion crowns. The foreign debt to be subtracted is less than one-tenth of this sum. "Our enemies," says an Austrian paper, "will not be spared the same disappointment in the economic field which they have already experienced in the political and especially the military sphere." Austria, apparently, while desiring peace, looks forward confidently toward the final outcome of the war. Of the private diplomatic agreements between Austria and Germany, we may rationally presume, the press knows nothing.

Discrediting Austria

France.—Catholics in France have been confronted with a new danger. The situation is described in an interview printed in the Libre Parole. Owing to the patriotism displayed by the Catholics, Radicals have found their customary methods of combating the Church ineffective. The prominence of the Holy Father in connection with the war has brought them into worse straits. Through pressure of public opinion and of foreign Governments they have been forced to communicate with him officially, "not with Mr. Della Chiesa, living at the Vatican, but with the Pope as Pope." His intervention, we are told, had the effect upon the Radicals which the raising of Lazarus had upon the Pharisees. They decreed that "This Messias must die." For this end they sought to bring confusion into the ranks of Catholics. To separate them from their Head was the systematic task of the Liberal press. A conference published in La Croix, March 11, will further illustrate the situation as the Catholic speaker viewed it:

Sowing Discord

> At this decisive moment of our history we are about to commit, in defiance of all justice, the criminal folly of hurling against the Pope the attacks which are eagerly turned to account by our adversaries. Already they have transformed them into poisonous arms against ourselves and into two-edged swords. To the Catholics of neutral countries these articles are shown with the remark: "See the dreadful impiety of France even in the supreme hour of her trial!" To the Pope and his court they are presented with even more complacency and clever insinuation: "Behold how blind your goodness has been and understand that you can hope for nothing from this nation."

Leaving aside the imputations implied here, the nature of "this criminal campaign" is sufficiently clear. The speaker wishes all true Frenchmen to open their eyes to it and, in the name of patriotism, adjures those who at other times attacked the Faith not to separate the heart of France from the heart of the Vicar of Christ. These last words were greeted with enthusiastic applause.

Germany.—April 1 was the centenary of Bismarck's birth. Berlin was bedecked with flags and the streets were riotous with colors as if for a victory. Commemorative exercises were held about the heroic Bismarck statue before the Reichstag. A wreath from the Emperor, with the inscription, "To the Iron Chancellor in an Iron time," was placed at the base of the statue by the Imperial Chancellor. A message had likewise been sent by the Emperor from army headquarters, where, as he said, "duty to the armed German people kept him." In the Iron Chancellor he saw a man "who in this present earnest time is especially dear to us as the personification of German strength and determination." The message continues:

The Bismarck Centennial

> We shall succeed. Our guarantee is in the first place God's help; in the second the unanimous will to achieve victory which inspires us all, and our solemn vow, tested by past events, that we will make every sacrifice for the Fatherland. The spirit of unity which has enabled our men in the battlefield to overcome everything that divides us will, I confidently hope, outlast the din of war and, after victory has been gained, will rightly bless and promote the internal development of the Empire.

In the "full and free expansion of German nationality," as the fruit of victory, he looked to see the crowning of the work for which Bismarck laid the foundation. The wreath offered by the members of the Reichstag bore the inscription: "To the creator of a united Empire from a united people." Thus the same thought of that national unity which now has stood the severest shocks of war was uppermost in the mind of the Emperor and of the representatives from among all classes of the people.

Great Britain.—The question of prohibition has awakened so lively an interest as to obscure and even overshadow the war. The working classes of the British Isles are inclined to be heavy drinkers, and this tendency has much increased since the outbreak of hostilities. Excitement, grief, added exertions necessary to increase the output of various supplies have all combined to produce a strain for which the workers have sought solace in drink. The excessive use of liquor has not only resulted in serious labor troubles, but has also notably lessened British efficiency and British strength. The consequence has been a marked inadequacy in the manufacture and shipment of war supplies, so that Great Britain, while abounding in soldiers, is lacking in most necessary equipment. A remedy for this state of affairs is judged to be imperatively necessary, and it has been suggested that Great Britain adopt a sweeping policy of enforced total prohibition. Efforts are being made to create a public sentiment in favor of the movement. The King, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Cabinet, Lord Kitchener, and many other prominent men in England have all pledged themselves to set an example both by abstaining personally and also by excluding strong drink from their households. The people at large have not shown any great enthusiasm for the movement. It is probable, therefore, that total prohibition will not be forced on the people, as such a measure would be so drastic as to affront the British sense of freedom and cause a violent reaction against the Government, and would probably defeat itself. What is likely is that the Government will adopt with regard to licensed houses in specific districts the measure it has already adopted in the case of railroads and factories. This would mean that the Government would take over complete control of all alcoholic beverages until the end of the war, or else regulate the sale of liquor. In this matter England is following the lead of France and Russia, and is acting not from moral, but from economic and military motives.

The Prohibition Movement

Ireland.—The Irish Volunteer has been suppressed. The editor, Professor John McNeill, who is president of the section of the Volunteers that adhere to the original purpose of defending Ireland on its own soil, was charged with no seditious utterance or other offence under the Defence of the Realm Act. Speaking to the Cork Volunteers, he attributed the suppression of his paper and the confiscation of its properties to his arraignment of the Government for bad faith on the question of Home Rule, and he warned the entire membership that they must not permit the illegal smothering of legitimate opinion, which Under-Secretary Nathan was enforcing throughout the country, to goad them into making rash reprisals or establishing secret societies. They must not go underground, but extend and perfect their military organization in the open, and hold themselves disciplined and ready to defend their country's interests and preserve its national integrity when better days arrive.

Working of the Realm Defence Act

There has been less emigration, absolutely and relatively, within the last six months than in any corresponding period since 1847. In January and February the emigrants totaled 685, against 1,231 in the same months last year. This is mainly accounted for by the disruption of sea traffic occasioned by the war and the closing of Irish ports, since the withdrawal of facilities for Land Purchase, especially from the Congested District Board, has made agricultural conditions more unsatisfactory than usual and caused acute distress in many portions of the West. The Dublin Corporation has deprived Dr. Kuno Meyer of the honorary citizenship they had conferred on him for his services to the Gaelic language and literature, and in the same resolution condemned the proposer for his conduct and motives. Numerous Irish organizations in Ireland and America have repudiated its action. Canon O'Leary, who received the freedom of Dublin at the same time as Dr. Meyer, and for the same reason, also entered vigorous protest. The Assize Judges found little crime, but complained of the slackness in recruiting.

Other Items of Interest

Mexico.—The big battle expected early last week at Matamoras apparently did not take place. But Villa's troops met with serious reverses at Queretaro and Guadalajara, and there was some skirmishing opposite Brownsville, Texas. In the following letter an American woman describes how she took care of wounded refugees:

A Woman's Relief Work

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Last Saturday morning, March 27, some young Mexican refugees came to me and stated that there was reason to believe that the attack on Matamoras would begin that day, and as there might be emergency calls for help for the wounded, they wished to know if they could depend on my aid, so I assured them they could. When I reached Brownsville on my return from a trip up the valley, I found the young men, accompanied by a Mexican girl, waiting for me. They appeared terror-stricken and reported that the attacking forces in charging the fortifications at about 11:00 a. m. had run into a machine gun brigade concealed in a trench, and had been repulsed with terrible slaughter. The wounded were being brought over the river and they had secured an old warehouse near the railroad tracks as a hospital. When we reached there four wounded officers, one of whom appeared to be in a dying condition, had been brought in, and were occupying the four cots in the building. Simultaneously with our arrival other automobiles came, each filled with the wounded, who were brought in and laid on the floor, their own surgeon accompanying them. The men had had nothing to eat since the night before. Most of them had been wounded about two o'clock in the afternoon and, owing to hunger and loss of blood, were in a pitiable condition. As all stores were closed at that hour, I went to the American proprietor of a hotel and asked him to lend me some glasses to give the men water. He emphatically refused, stating that he needed them for his own use.

I then sent some Mexican young men to get milk and bread and tin cups by some means, and gave my attention to doing what I could to assist the doctor. In the meantime the automobiles were still coming with the wounded. Every available inch of floor space was taken, and the drivers of the cars reported that scores more were lying on the ground awaiting their turn. Word had gotten out in town of what was happening and crowds of Mexicans thronged the street so that it was almost impossible for the cars to reach the door. There were many Carranzista sympathizers in the crowd and as they watched the arrival of these Villista soldiers they became hostile in their actions.

After midnight I took one of the automobiles and, accompanied by a Mexican and an American, went to Fort Brown. An officer came out and I reported to him the conditions at the temporary hospitals, stating that I and a Mexican girl were there alone with the wounded men and that I needed protection while I did what was required of me. The terms and manner of his reply would have been called rude if it had not been delivered by "a soldier and a gentleman." He stated that he had nothing to do with the wounded men being here and he would have nothing to do with the care of them. I then went to the telephone in the Miller Hotel, a short distance from the post, and had one of the men accompanying me call a Red Cross doctor of the place, who was known to have a large room equipped with cots and other necessities, and ask his permission to take the wounded men there. We were told, however, that nothing could be done till morning. I insisted that the case was urgent, for the wounded men should not be forced to lie on the ground all night unattended. But my protests were unheeded.

At last, after much difficulty, we secured permission to use an old theater building in the Mexican quarter, without lights, water or any furniture. When I saw the conditions under which we should have to work, I sent a personal messenger to the Red Cross begging them in the name of humanity, to open the other building for us. The reply came: "We can do nothing until morning. That room is reserved for the Carranzistas." By turning some of the automobiles so that the headlights shone in at the door and windows we were able to get the men into the building, and in time water, lights and other necessities were procured. All the wounded bore their sufferings in courageous silence. I saw men submit to excruciating operations, such as are usually undertaken only with the aid of anesthetics, and I never heard a groan. When I left the building there were over eighty men and boys awaiting the doctor's attention.

Brownsville, Texas, March 30. ELIZABETH C. HENDRIX.

Mr. Arthur Bullard Johnson, the spokesman of the American colony in Mexico City, calls the situation there "more hopeless than ever" and, in his message to the State Department, thus summarizes the wrongs and horrors the capital has witnessed since last August:

"More Hopeless than Ever"

The arbitrary taking from Mexicans and foreigners of property, including houses here, automobiles, garages, furniture, money and crops; the issuing of decrees so in contravention of right, fairness and justice as to be almost incredible; the deliberate, persistent and ill-concealed attempt to starve a city of 500,000 inhabitants, depriving them of water, fuel and transportation; the shipping of defenceless women in locked cattle cars to Vera Cruz; the carrying away of the controllers of electric street cars, thus paralyzing transit; the closing of the courts and schools; the holding of priests for ransom; the arrest and detention of 300 business men who had assembled at the request of the General in charge of the city; the prosecution of Spaniards, suppression of mails and violation of sealed correspondence, both foreign and domestic; the removal of public archives and the stripping of public buildings; the open invitation to riot and loot; the sacking of churches and desecration of images; the killing of men, and the outraging of women, are events too recent and well known to permit their being overlooked in forming judgment.

News came of two Americans, two Germans and two Turks being executed recently by the warring factions. In this attitude toward the citizens of foreign countries the rival leaders show themselves aggressively neutral.

Enrique C. Llorente, confidential agent at Washington of the Villa-Zapata Convention, has issued a pamphlet in which Villa is portrayed as a man whom pure zeal for the law has made a pillager and persecutor of the Church. His press agent writes that when forced to concentrate his attention upon the disposition of the members of the religious Orders, found in his lines, whom he was bound by law to expel from Mexican territory, Villa answered the question by denying their claims to special consideration and forthwith deporting them. He allowed them, however, to remove a certain portion of their personal goods, but, as a military measure, appropriated the property held by them as property of the Church, under the law escheating to the State. Since the expulsion of these undesirables was imposed upon General Villa by the law neither his act nor the manner of his performing it can be questioned.

Villa's New Rôle

Martyr as he was to duty, Villa never flinched. The sacred laws of his country bade him rob, murder and outrage religious, so like a true patriot, who is "not opposed to the Church as an institution" he obeyed.

The Young Man and Sociology*

SOMEWHERE at some time sociology has been called "the dismal science." Some doubt there has been, it is true, as to whether it should be called a science at all; but be that as it may, it certainly does not deserve the adjective which has been prefixed to that term in its connection. Rather should it be called the science of joy. It is true that often it deals with the illnesses of the social organism, marshaling before it for review the dependent, the defective and the delinquent classes, the halt and the blind, the idiot and the imbecile, the drunkard and those able in body but stricken, nevertheless, with the haunting malady of destitution who, at certain periods, may even express their resentment in wild-eyed revolution. It is true, likewise, that often it must divert its attention to column after column and volume after volume of social statistics. Yet beneath these somber and dry details, comprising but a portion of the field of sociology, there pulses the beautiful and joyous principle of life, given by the hands of the Creator, life as it is really lived by the highest of God's mundane creatures, life as it is protected and strengthened and perfected by the unity and elasticity of the social body, itself of divine fabrication.

For sociology is the study of man in society and of that society in which he dwells, of man among his neighbors, not on some desert island, not in some abstract relationship, but as he really exists, as a member of a social group: as he earns his food, as he spends or uses that which he earns, as he and his wife and their family are protected in their work and in their home, as he bands himself with his fellows for enjoyment or mutual protection, not alone here in twentieth century America, but in many times and places. For these conditions have been, or may be at the present among the Mundas and the Macassars and the Italones, as they were in England in the later fifteenth century, in the Italian principalities and republics in the thirteenth, in Rome or China or Scythia in the first. And from all these considerations it is decided what future form society should take in order to insure it own health and stability and the highest well-being of mankind.

To our study, as a consequence, history contributes its portion, as do biology, medicine, jurisprudence, anthropology, ethnology, economics, psychology and, above all, ethics, that most important of natural sciences, of which sociology is in reality an off-shoot or a part. It is in this that the fascination of sociology lies for the young man of some gifts of mind—the great field of inquiry and research which it opens up to him—a fascination which deepens and grows as one advances in the study.

Closely akin to this science, in that it is one of the practical manifestations of the principles and rules which sociology enunciates, is the work of the one who engages in the study and care of the members of a particular class or group of people, that of the social worker or social investigator. Though his occupation must not be confused with the tasks of the sociologist proper, who deals, as has been seen, with the broad principles which underlie social relationships, the social worker or investigator may properly be called a practical sociologist, even as this term can likewise be applied to the priest and statesman and labor leader, to the socially conscious lawyer and doctor and educator, and to all those who assist in some specific manner in the maintenance of the health of society. As in so many other cases, the line between this work and that of the sociologist is quite frequently, in the concrete, extremely difficult to draw. In some instances the two functions will be carried on by the same person. Perhaps the two are dependent upon each other more than is generally appreciated. The writer or teacher of sociology, without an intimate knowledge of the feelings and aspirations and significance of the various classes and movements about him, will invariably go astray in his deductions. He will not only misunderstand present social phenomena, but will likewise misinterpret those that have occurred in the past. The practical sociologist, without a firm grasp of the general principles which should guide his investigations and his conduct, is almost hopelessly lost, no matter in what department he may labor.

From this it necessarily follows that he who is to study sociology should, as early as possible, without danger to himself, acquaint himself personally with the trade unions, the socialist movement, modern philanthropy, such as represented by the Charity Organization Society, the unskilled, unorganized workers, the modern feminist movement, and various other existing forms of human life, association and activity. The happy circumstances are not given to every man to see each one of these forces closely and intimately within a short time, but the aim should be to do so whenever opportunity allows. Not only should these contemporary movements be studied out of books: the student must also get in touch with them practically and endeavor to understand the frame of mind or point of view of the representatives of each of these forces.

A knowledge of Catholic philosophy is of the utmost importance to the sociologist. This can not be too strongly emphasized. For, sociology, enunciated or applied, dealing with man's social conduct, will be carried out according as the question is answered: "Whence is this being and whither is he bound? Whence is this society in which he lives and why was it formed?" This philosophical requirement ordinarily implies preparation through a classical course given at some Catholic college or university—a preparation which is, as a rule, absolutely necessary. History must be known thoroughly and comprehensively by the teacher or writer on sociological topics; without this a due sense of proportion in regard to the advantages and weaknesses of the particular period and phase of society in which he lives, or which he studies, will never be attained, nor can he safely suggest remedies for the evils which he finds or the proper course of action to be followed in any particular case. As to modern languages, German and French, particularly the former, are indispensable requisites for the sociologist; Italian and Spanish and some of the Slavic tongues, though these latter are extremely difficult to learn, are desirable in this country for contemporary studies.

Then, as to the principles of social life and conduct themselves: these are sometimes acquired by the student through his own resources after long years of arduous and patient study, but the cases of such are very rare. They are due more than anything else to extremely fortunate circumstances or to an extraordinary adaptability for the work. Various Catholic universities provide good courses in sociological subjects, furnishing a foundation for further activities in this field, at least one with practical work attached. The Central Verein is endeavoring in time to erect an institution which will not only devote its entire energies to this field of learning and activity, but will serve as a center for a true Catholic social movement in this land.

As to the opportunities and monetary rewards in this branch of endeavor, it must be admitted that in sociology proper they are at the present uncertain and small. It is quite doubtful that our State or endowed universities will fill their sociological chairs with men basing their ideas on Catholic philosophy. Our Catholic institutions, partly through lack of means, are slow to introduce this branch into their curricula, and are hesitant to bestow such positions on laymen. Were the supply greater, it might be said, the demand might accordingly expand. In practical social work there are for the present better prospects. There is government investigation work; States and municipalities are conducting social surveys of various kinds, and cities are instituting social welfare departments, with commissioners needed in various social fields. There is no reason why Catholics should not be represented in just proportion in such occupations.

In general, the sociologist will find his greatest reward in the enjoyment of his work and in the part which he will be called upon to play. The social question is the great, living question of the time in which we live. He who has given a professional and life-time study to its ramifications should contribute an important share toward its solution. The difficulties in this science, it is true, are not yet properly appreciated; there are still those who, with insufficient knowledge and quite confused ideas, imagine that they can deal with all the problems of society. But this period is passing, and the opinions of him who has given his whole energies to these studies will gain more and more recognition. To him who has mastered in some degree, at least, the principles of sociology will, moreover, be awarded in the future an important place in public life; for it is quite clear that we are passing into a new phase of social development, requiring of the men who are to consummate great things a deep knowledge of social life and growth. The attractions of this science, the silent joys that go with it and the good that one can accomplish in it, particularly in these pioneer days of its existence, offer a great deal to the idealistic and well-poised and studious young man.

The Church and Religious Education

To the Editor of America:

What is the exact position of the Catholic Church in regard to religious education in public schools? Catholic periodicals deplore the lack of religious training in these schools, yet, as far as I know, they offer no remedy for this deficiency. Is it a wonder that Catholics are regarded as the foes of the public school? All children can not be sent to religious schools, nor can religious teaching be very well introduced into public schools without stirring up sectarian troubles, and still the children must be educated. How do Catholics propose to solve the problem of the "godless public school"? An answer in your weekly magazine will be appreciated.

Madison, Wisconsin. R. W. L.

"R. W. L." approaches the problem in a truly helpful spirit! We are to consider it settled that there is to be no religious training in the public schools, and then we are invited to solve the problem of the "godless public school"! We are to blame for not offering a remedy, but the only remedy that is a remedy is specifically excluded, so far as the public schools are concerned! And we are asked whether it is wonderful that Catholics are considered to be foes of the public school!

Our correspondent dates his letter from the College of Agriculture at the University of Wisconsin, and we must assume that he possesses an intelligence more or less active and reasonably matured. Perhaps he will permit us to put to him a question or two.

We will suppose that there is in Madison a parochial school attended by 1,000 Catholic children. This school was erected at the cost of the parishioners, and is maintained from the same fund. Through this school pass in the course of time an average number of 1,000, or thereabouts. In the same street there is a public school, supported by the city, having been built by public funds, and 1,000 children are in course of education therein. The children graduating from the parochial school and those graduating from the public school are of approximately the same age, and after graduation are possessed of precisely the same status, privileges and duties under the laws of Wisconsin. The State recognizes no difference whatever as between the public school children and those of the parochial school. One set of children have received an education at private cost, while the others have been educated at the cost of the public treasury. The people of Madison have accepted a dole of private money for the education of 1,000 children, for whose education the public fund would otherwise have been drawn upon. Not only have they done this, but they have levied educational taxes as well upon those whose dole they accepted.

How can this be justified? Either the education provided by the parochial school satisfies the requirements of the State, or it does not. If it does satisfy the requirements of the State, why does not the State pay for it? If it does not satisfy the requirements of the State, why does not the State close the schools? Is it any wonder that we Catholics can't understand the logic of the present situation? Is it any wonder that we find it irritating to discuss it with people who are afraid of this conclusion?

If "R. W. L." will ponder a little on the dilemma proposed to him, he may be able to clear his mind on the subject sufficiently to be able to answer his own questions for himself. Moreover, in last week's AMERICA (p. 595), there was information regarding the solution of the problem found in Germany. If a country in which one form of religion is by law established can find a means to give children of other faiths a religious training in schools at public cost, one would think that there should be little difficulty in a country where there is no established form of religion and all forms are equally free before the law. Nowhere on the face of the earth is there a school system so illogical as ours.

If "R. W. L." wants to know what Catholics propose to do, the answer is simple. In the first place, they will continue, at their own cost, to build and maintain their own schools for Catholic children to the extreme limit of their ability to find the means. In the second place, they will resist to the utmost of their power any and all attempts to make the public school education either definitely anti-religious or definitely sectarian. And in the third place, to those who ask of them what ought to be done, they will say: "Either close our schools or pay for them." And inasmuch as no one dares to propose that our schools should be closed, the chances are that the American people will continue as at present, doing neither the one nor the other.

May we ask "R. W. L." why?

"Fair Play"

IT is always timely to echo the words of our Blessed Lord, that Christians are the light of the world, especially since it has long been the fashion to rely upon the tendency of data for authority, and because the popular mind is quite content with a superficial display of reasoning. On the ground that private judgment is the rightful court of last appeal in matters of conscience, one thing is as good as another in creed, and apparently in many other important affairs of life. Because Christians are the light of the world it is their mission to overcome spiritual and mental darkness. The task seems never to have been weightier than that set before the faithful to-day.

It is assumed "Fair Play" to put the superman on a level with the saints of God, although the intensified utterance of the Nietzschean has no better origin than cosmic force and color, while an all holy Creator is the author of the men after God's own heart. In the one case "The Great Longing" is self-expression, nothing more; in the other it is the passion to see the Lord God face to face. Once the false premise is conceded all is lost and figs may be made to grow upon thistles. But as Christians will not concede the premise, Fair Play must struggle mightily to keep her judgment seat upon those basic principles which move not so much as a hair's breadth for the accommodation of the numerous cults which may be named more or less correctly under one phrase—determinism.

Poor Fair Play! She has a hard time of it, for those who should be her ardent friends are too often her zealous foes. It frequently happens that, all in the confusion of good faith, she is appealed to by those of her own kith and kin to give advantage to her enemies.

In the long run Fair Play wins the race, but at what a cost. Sixty years ago coeducation was insisted upon; boys and girls should be given the self-same studies willy-nilly. But gradually the constitution natural to beings human asserted itself as against the attempt to make the right hand and the left perform the identical task in the identical way, regardless of the fact that one thumb points to the right while the other thumb points to the left. The practice of coeducation has at length exploded the theory of coeducation. Even at Radcliffe, where the young women are free to take the courses given to the men at Harvard, there is a marked difference in the curriculum. Higher education for women? Yes, the higher the better. But Fair Play is now seen, even by the sometime ardent advocates of coeducation, plainly to demand that studies shall be fitted to the nature of the sexes. No amount of bad education has succeeded in changing the nature of the sexes, though it has many sins to expiate for attempting to eliminate the differences of the sexes, for God has made one for the other. The sexes are not equal, neither are they unequal, but exactly, perfectly, complementary one to the other in the make-up of the civilized state. Plainly it is the part of education to round out to perfection the differing qualities of the two halves of the one whole. Fair Play certainly has no quarrel with Catholic educators on this score.

Fair Play is now waging a harder battle upon the educational field, for the assault upon her now wears an economic aspect. Women teachers are demanding equal pay with men. Here is a separation of the mutual interests of the sexes rather than a conformity to the natural requirements of the sexes.

It is agreed that equal work shall receive equal pay. But the psychological influence of a master when teaching geography and that of a mistress is not to be measured by the same unit. The principle of measurement is that objects, qualities and intensities shall be related to a unit like unto themselves. Thus a unit of light is the measure of light. Now it is common knowledge that the mental and moral stimulus given by the masculine presence is in itself something quite unlike that given by the female presence. This makes it certain that a different education is being received, consequently there is not a product of "equal education" to measure. At the fountain-head two complementary influences upon the child are perfectly blended, as he receives his education at once from his father and his mother. Character building is indeed something other than the piece-work of stitching shoes in a factory, for which "equal pay" is a just compensation merely on economic ground; the moral measurements are left out of consideration.

The general demand for equal pay for the sexes aims a deadly blow at the equilibrium established by nature, which Fair Play is bound to defend. The determinists, under the guise of "equal rights," are digging from under the economic support of the family. They would have the whole female sex—equal with men—working in the public industries. No, the home would not be abolished! Under this scheme the home must "die out" for want of economic support. The disorder inflicted on the body politic by "equal education" was as a slight indisposition relative to the black death that promises to follow in the wake of "equal rights" and "equal pay" if it shall be translated from current thought into general practice. With civil society in a good state of health the man's wage is a family wage, while the woman's wage is rightly adjusted by individual standards of living. With determinists in the philosophical saddle going at full tilt the black death is not a mere scarecrow. Yet since the great Pope Leo XIII warned his world-wide flock that the workman's wage should be sustained at a point sufficient to support the family at the very lowest rung of the social ladder, in "frugal comfort," Catholics have no excuse for falling under the sway of the tempter, though he make never so alluring an appeal to Fair Play.

So confused is the public mind as to whether God's law is mocked, that foul seems fair and fair seems foul. A man who should know better said: "How would you feel if a socialist upon the platform were to hold up a prayer-book between his thumb and forefinger, as though it were foul to the touch, as was done to a piece of socialist literature by a Catholic lecturer?" Much-abused Fair Play! One thing is as good as another when the scales of judgment are set upon the shifting sands of private opinion. A piece of socialist literature propagating the infamous doctrine in Bebel's book on "Woman," and the "Origin of the Family," by Marx and Engels, which makes the earth-worm the prototype of the mother of a good-sized family of children, at par with a Catholic prayer-book!

Now, since the Knights of Columbus have instituted a defence against the socialist assault upon Christian standards, their national lecturers are pestered, all in the name of Fair Play, to give the local socialists a chance to defend themselves in debate. Strange to say, it not infrequently happens that generous-hearted Catholics are caught in this web of confusion. But the socialists are not the injured party; they are the aggressors. For more than a quarter of a century they have been sowing the seeds of rebellion against right reason. Now that they are men competent to show that socialism was indeed sired by atheism and bred in misunderstanding, the advocates of blasphemy, treason and free-love claim for their own one-half of the evening devoted to the defence of religion, patriotism and family purity. Surely, Catholics should freely detect Foul Play in the mask of Fair Play.

Magazines Young People Read

THERE never was a time in the world's history when so much reading was being done by so many people as now. Presumably this ought to be an index of the deep intellectual interests of our generation and of its ardent seeking after knowledge. A friend of mine to whom the aphorism "Reading maketh a full man" was quoted to prove that "the masses" are profiting wonderfully by the reading habit they have now contracted, shrewdly remarked: "But, Bacon, observe, does not say of just what material reading maketh a man full. That depends on what the reading is. Much of the light reading done nowadays makes our young people full of nonsense, while much of the serious reading others indulge in fills them with conceit."

One thing our modern passion for reading does not do is to make people full of thought. There are many thinking men connected with educational institutions in this country who aver that there was never a time when people did less thinking than now. The dean of the literary departments in one of our leading universities said, not long ago, that if the present craze for reading cheap, trivial stuff was not halted soon there would be no one left in this country who could do real thinking. As for the taste that is being developed by all this reading one needs only to see the "shows" that our people attend, the cheap, catchy music that they delight in, the cartoons and "comics" that hold their attention, to find a very serious indictment of our modern intellectual life. This generation that does more reading than any other in the world's history, has more trivial interests than any other of which we have any record.

The reading the older people indulge in perhaps does not matter much. They have decided that they are not going to use their intellects in life for any serious purpose, so I suppose they may be permitted to use them only for furnishing themselves with cheap amusement. It is different, however, with the rising generation. There is still some hope of promoting the intellectual life of the young, for they are extremely susceptible to suggestions received from their reading. Young people are inclined to think that anything that is printed must be true, and that a writer who gets into print is wiser than any one in their own environment, no matter how much experience or education he or she may have.

Now I venture to say that the greater part of our young folk's leisure hours is used reading the magazines. A great French teacher once said that it does not make so much difference what a man does with the hours in which he has to work, but the best possible index to his character, and usually the best hint as to his future, is to be found in what he does with his leisure. But I fear no one would value highly either the present or the future of young folk who read our present-day popular magazines.

These popular magazines used to be rather instructive and, as a rule, quite harmless periodicals, which gathered together articles on a number of interesting topics and stories that sometimes had distinct literary merit, but were generally chosen with an eye to their absolute innocuousness, for it was felt that the slightest infraction of decency in any way would ruin the circulation of the magazine. They were meant to pass from hand to hand in the family. But in the effort to increase their circulation, they have now changed their character very materially. It was soon found that appeals to the sensual side of humanity were very attractive to young readers having an insatiable curiosity in such matters, and so it was not long before a serious degeneration took place in the character of even the magazines that used to be quite free from such undesirable matter. The instructive articles have nearly all disappeared, or, if printed, they prove to be some scientific sensation that is a travesty on real science.

No one accepts the "feature-writers'" magazine articles as serious contributions to knowledge. The latest solution of the mystery of life, the latest nonsense about hypnotism, the weight of the soul; "twilight sleep" and its vagaries; sex hygiene and eugenics: these are the so-called instructive articles of the magazines. They give young people the idea that they know a great deal more than their elders about things in general, and thus increase that lack of respect for the opinions of others that is so striking a characteristic of our generation. Information obtained in this scrappy way from magazine articles, even when it is quite correct, does not really educate or develop the mind, because it fails to show the relations of the knowledge thus acquired to other knowledge, and is usually, therefore, worse than useless.

The "magazine habit" ruins power of concentration; it has another and more serious result. In recent years the popular magazines have become purveyors of very undesirable ideas for young people. I fear few parents realize how unsuitable for young folk's reading many of the most popular magazines have become. It requires only an occasional dip into them to find, that while they are of no usefulness except as a cheap pastime, they frequently contain stories that are well calculated to do a great deal of harm to young minds. Let me illustrate what I mean by some concrete comments.

In one of the popular magazines, which a few years ago used to be, perhaps, the most widely-circulated magazine in the country, and whose name was a guarantee of reasonable freedom from anything objectionable, there appeared not long since a story that for unspeakable viciousness is almost unparalleled. I do not say this of myself, the story was called to my attention in a group of men who had all been for more than twenty years in newspaper work, from reporter to editor, and who were not likely, therefore, to be prudes. They agreed to a man that they had never read anything that was quite so vile and vicious in its suggestion as was this story. It was literally a tale of animal lust. It appeared under the name of a man who belongs to an old American family, and who has, on occasion, turned out good work. That it should have been published in a magazine that was freely sold on our newsstands and should have been widely read by young folk shows to what a pass license in the publication of evil suggestions has come.

The favorite form of story in practically all the cheap magazines just now is one that, I suppose, is meant to make its appeal to the young girl. These are the most numerous readers of magazines, and evidently they are interested in this type of story. Hence the uniformity with which it is found in practically all the cheap magazines. It is the tale of the young girl longing for experiences in life, and somehow or other getting away from social conventions and having "adventures," sometimes with low sailors in some Eastern port; with Chinamen in San Francisco; or with prize-fighters and questionable characters in Paris, yet somehow escaping unscathed and marrying some one who has rescued her from some especially thorny situation and, of course, living happily with him ever after. She has kept her virtue; but oh, the knowledge of men and of the world that she has gained from her experience, and the breadth of view of life, "Real Life"—only capitals express it adequately—that has been obtained from the risks through which she has passed!

These stories are meant to show that even the men of the brutal classes are at once converted from the error of their ways and put off their brutality in the presence of the pretty American girl who is out seeking adventures. The lion being led home by the Virgin Una in the fable is as nothing compared to the way in which these young women by a glance of their eyes and the wonderful influence of their maidenly presence convert hardened sinners and old roués into the gentlest of protectors of maidenly virtue and innocence.

I doubt if falser views of life can possibly be found than those given in these stories. Yet this is the principal reading of large numbers of our young women, and particularly those whose occupations take them away from home and into association with men of all kinds. They are tempted to seek adventures that are very alluring to youth, and are told that that is the only way to get all there is in life and to be broadened and educated and rendered experienced.

Now, let us not forget that the magazines which contain such dangerous nonsense are selling by the hundreds of thousands in this country. One is said to have a circulation of more than 1,000,000 a month. Advertisers are willing to pay for advertising on the basis of those figures. It is computed that each magazine is read on the average by, at least, three persons. It is the girls, moreover, rather than the boys, who are reading these stories. Therefore we should not be surprised to hear almost daily of elopements, hasty marriages, seductions, and worse, for our magazines are preparing the young for these things. Youth always takes what is suggested to it, if the suggestion is frequent and positive enough, unless by chance there is character, environment and training to safeguard the young from temptation. Even these fail, however, to be of service against the constant suggestion of evil, foolishness and worse. For "the fascination of trifles," says Holy Writ, "obscureth good things."

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., PH.D.

South America's Catholicism

THE Board of Foreign Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church started, three months ago, a magazine called the World Outlook, the editorial announcement of which assured the reader that:

> The dramatic part played by Christian mission schools, colleges, hospitals and churches in the kaleidoscope of progress will be presented in its due relation to other factors—commercial, industrial, social and political. The effort will be made to give a complete picture of modern progress—not a one-sided, or one-angled view.

The foregoing conciliatory prologue was fairly well lived up to in the January number of the periodical, but the February issue seems to have been deliberately handed over to a few zealots, who are persuaded that the surest way of getting wealthy Protestants interested in South America is by attacking the faith of that continent's 50,000,000 inhabitants. On a page facing a good picture of the "Christ of the Andes," there is printed, doubtless as a corrective, a photograph of an important discovery S. Earl Taylor made. For in Cuzco he found, cut in stone over a church door, not "Come unto me all ye that labor," but "Come unto Mary all ye who are weary," a wicked "perversion of Scripture," which is proof positive, of course, that the Blessed Virgin of Cuzco rather than the Christ of the Andes is the chief object of South America's worship. The thoughtless Catholic reader would see in the inscription nothing but a pious application to Our Lady of her Divine Son's words, but many a Methodist subscriber of the World Outlook was probably shocked into being unusually generous toward the South American mission fund.

"Ecuador," continues Mr. Earl, taking as his authority a newspaper correspondent who visited that land twenty years ago, is "the most bigoted Roman Catholic country in America" and, consequently, "the most backward country on the continent—physically, intellectually and morally." He neglects, however, to give any recent facts or statistics to prove these sweeping assertions. The reason for this oversight was, perhaps, his eagerness to communicate some startling news about the South American Inquisition which was founded "to stamp out the hated heresy of Protestantism" and "cost tens of thousands of lives." Who would have thought South American Protestants were so numerous! Where in the world did they all come from? Could they have been imported from England? With so many blessed martyrs to its credit, one would think Protestantism should be thriving vigorously in that southern continent.

This, however, does not seem to be the case, for, on another page of the February World Outlook, Homer C. Stuntz, "Bishop for South America"—note the for—after recounting the various activities of Protestantism in his territorially vast diocese, concludes with this solemn warning:

> In all Peru we have but five men from the United States, only three of these ordained; in all Argentina, only eleven missionaries in a territory larger than the United States east of the Mississippi river. If we had a hundred missionaries more than our present force, we could send them to important centers where to-day there is absolutely no Gospel preaching. If we do the job the Church has sent us down here to do, we must have more money for property and we should double our forces within five years.

The last sentence of the appeal from this apostle whom "the Church has sent" to the benighted Latin Romanists seems to be the grand climax of his sermon. Unquestionably, Bishop Stuntz is a tireless seeker after contributions, for besides writing that World Outlook article, he has prepared for wide circulation a pamphlet entitled "Roman Catholicism in South America" which is sure to loosen the purse-strings of pious Methodists. The "Bishop for South America" evidently believes that when Romanism is the enemy all methods of warfare are lawful, for he writes:

> There is published in Buenos Aires a weekly comic paper like the Asino, of Rome, and somewhat like Life, of New York. It is maintained partly for the purpose of ridiculing friars, priests and the Catholic faith in general. It is true that this paper is hostile to Christianity as it is represented by the Roman Church and is therefore understood to be opposed to religion in any form. But this is not the case. Its cartoons are leveled at immoral and medieval priestly leadership. When our church held a great Sunday school rally in Prince George's Hall, in Buenos Aires, on Conference Sunday, last February, this paper—Fray Mocho—took flash-light pictures, secured photographs of the leading missionaries and Sunday-school workers, and gave several pages to a sympathetic write-up of that truly great gathering.

So the Bishop cordially welcomes as an ally a blasphemous and licentious publication "like the Asino, of Rome"!

In this same number of the World Outlook James M. Taylor supplies the reader with a quantity of novel information regarding South American Catholicism. The great misfortune, it seems, of that wretched continent was the fact that it had a "bad start." For South America was blessed with "no Mayflower and no Plymouth Rock." Moreover, "it must be understood that the Romanism of South America is not the Romanism of the United States, and is not in any true sense Christian." Mr. Taylor then proceeds to administer a series of remunerative shocks to the reader by citing once more the familiar statistics of the Protestant pamphleteer regarding the intellectual and moral condition of the people, and ends with this outrageous calumny: "It is the belief of honest men in South America, who have been raised in the Roman Church, that, as a class, there are few people more immoral than the priests."

So the World Outlook that promised in its opening number to "give a complete picture of modern progress—not a one-sided, or one-angled view," allows its contributor to charge the entire priesthood of South America with practising filthy immorality. This monstrous accusation, moreover, is made on the supposed testimony of "honest men," who carefully avoid, as is usual in such cases, making any mention whatever of persons, places, times or circumstances.

To answer such vague and sweeping charges as the above is a hopeless task, and of that those who make them are thoroughly aware. If we prove that the clergy of Ecuador are virtuous and zealous, the accusation of moral laxity will, doubtless, be transferred to the priests of Peru. If we succeed in getting affidavits testifying to the upright lives of the Peruvian clergy, probably the priests of Chile would then be attacked, and so on. Regarding the character of the latter, Father H. J. Swift, S.J., writes in the Canadian Messenger for April:

> As a matter of fact, the Chilean clergy are a body of picked men, made up largely of the scions of families whose names are interwoven with all that is high-minded and patriotic in the history of the country. Even supposing, absurdly enough, indeed, that supernatural motives were to fail to influence them, their respect for their family names would be more than sufficient to hold them to the execution of their sublime functions. It would be hard to name a pious organization or a good work that is not recognized, encouraged and fostered by the clergy of Chile.

As a specimen of the way that calumnies regarding the priests and people of South America are started and spread, the following incident, with its ensuing correspondence, may interest the reader: Mr. Hubert Hormsby, who is in charge of the United Fruit Company's welfare work in Central and South America, addressed a conference of welfare workers, held on the evening of November 23, 1914, in the National Civic Federation rooms, Metropolitan Building, New York, and is reported to have said:

> That because of the oppression and other acts of the Roman Catholic priesthood the people had practically given up all religion and cast the priests aside; and that the "clinic" established in connection with welfare work had taken the place of the Father Confessors, referring to the Roman priests.

Mr. John S. Kennedy, of Brooklyn, who heard Mr. Hormsby's remarks, wrote a courteous letter to the United Fruit Company and asked if the views advanced by the lecturer express "the current situation in these countries as understood by your officers." The United Fruit Company took no pains with Mr. Kennedy's difficulty.

The quoted passage from Mr. Hormsby's lecture was then shown to various South and Central Americans now living in New York, and their opinion was asked as to the truth of the lecturer's assertions. A prominent official of Costa Rica was the first to be interviewed. He laughed when he saw the quotations, remarking:

> It was the sort of thing people of that stamp like to say! As a matter of fact, there was no truth in it. Some twenty-five years ago, or over, certain laws were passed, which acted to prevent the political activities of priests. Since that time the Church in Costa Rica had prospered; many churches had been built, and the people at large were, on the whole, very faithful in their religion. The priests attend actively to their religious duties and are very well regarded.

A native of Colombia, Mr. Luis F. Toro, 471 Central Park West, New York, was then shown the passage. He wrote:

> In Colombia, fortunately, the relations between Church and State are cordial and have been so since 1886. Catholicism is the religion of the State. I do not exaggerate when I assure you that the inhabitants of Colombia's interior, who form the greater portion of the population, are Catholics, not in name only, but are good Catholics and have great respect for their priests. About the natives of the coast I can not speak with the same positiveness, for I do not know them so well. But this I can say of all: they suffer from no "oppression" on the part of the priesthood.

Mr. J. R. de la Torres Bueno, of White Plains, N. Y., who is a native of Peru, was then asked to comment on Mr. Hormsby's statement and wrote as follows:

> Speaking as a Peruvian, I have always heard that we suffer from a considerable lack of clergy to care properly for the Indian population in the more distant regions of the country. As for any "oppression" of the people, or of any portion of them, by the priests, I have never heard of it. In Peru, the convents are heavily endowed and, therefore, it is not necessary to call on the people for the support of the clergy. Furthermore, the Government, with the property taken from the suppressed monastic Orders, supports the parish priests.

Mrs. R. A. Goelkel, a Venezuelan lady, gives this testimony about conditions at home:

> With regard to Venezuela, my country, let me say that the clergy are good, zealous men and are universally respected. They are particularly active in promoting Catholic education. In Venezuela all the Catholics take an honest pride in their priests, who are considered the guardians of everything that is best in our civilization.

But will the publication of letters like the foregoing have the slightest influence in keeping such writers as Homer C. Stuntz, S. Earl Taylor or James M. Taylor from calumniating the priests and people of Latin America? None whatever. That is too much to expect. For the spread of calumnies about the Catholic Church seems to be a vitally important element in Methodism's missionary activities. Long experience has perhaps taught the leaders of the sect that vilifying Rome is the most effective way of interesting in "the cause" pious Protestants who are as credulous as they are wealthy.

Walter Dwight, S.J.

The Catholic Church Extension Society

A CHILD, which has passed its ninth birthday by a few months only, has scarcely the right to speak before its elders; but it is the weakness of youth that it should desire to say something at least for itself. The Catholic Church Extension Society is in that condition. Its tenth birthday will not occur before the 18th of next October, but the child is enthusiastic and anxious to please. It is willing always to stand up and recite its little piece for visitors, not without an eye on the fact that a good performance often brings out a kindly pat on the head and perhaps a silver piece, with a "God bless you." Having been invited to speak, here is our little recitation:

Our name is Church Extension. We were born in 1905, and, like many good men and good things, we were born in poverty. Our first dollar came from a newsboy (which is a fact, though we have frequently been charged with telling the story for effect). We have that dollar yet. The first meeting was held in the home of Archbishop Quigley in Chicago. There were nineteen present, including Archbishop Bourgade of sainted memory, Bishops Hennessy of Wichita and Muldoon of Rockford. The other founders were divided about equally between the clergy and the laity. The Society was incorporated in the State of Michigan. Its first office was the library of the rectory in the little parish of Lapeer in the Diocese of Detroit. After a year, it moved to Chicago where its headquarters have been ever since, and where they are now fixed for the future by a Papal Brief. The Society has been three times approved of by Rome. It is under the direct protection and guidance of the Holy See through its chancellor, the Archbishop of Chicago, and through the appointment of its president every five years by the Holy Father himself. The objects which called it forth are set down in a long paragraph in its Constitution, but they may be summed up in the fact that the Society is a home mission organization, doing for the Church in the United States and her colonies—yet in a small way and by different methods—what the Society for the Propagation of the Faith is doing for foreign missions. The mission needs of the Church in America, however, for the last ten years, have called mostly for the building of chapels in out-of-the-way places, the giving of missions in these same remote regions, the distribution of Catholic literature, and the fostering of vocations to the missionary priesthood. So the best work of the Society has been along these lines. Up to the present (February, 1915) the Society has been responsible for the building of over one thousand chapels. It possesses three chapel cars, two of them of the latest steel construction, and two motor chapels. It has a number of students pledged, if they become priests, to go to missionary dioceses and already some priests were ordained from among its boys, and are at work. Its chapel building activities still go on at the rate of about three chapels each week. Its annual revenues fluctuate between one hundred and twenty-five and three hundred thousand dollars. It has practically no collections, no branches, no fixed revenue. All its money comes as a result of filling the mails with missionary literature and appeals, "seeing" people who are suspected of having a combination of generosity and capital, and making public through its magazines the story of missions and missionaries in the United States and colonies.

To understand why the Society gives so much attention to chapel building, it is necessary to know that in nine out of every ten of the smaller centers of population in the United States, there are no Catholic organized activities, but there may be some eight to twenty families in each—pioneers or too poor to build for themselves. The first step toward getting these people together is often taken by the chapel or motor cars, which drag a whole parish equipment into a town and keep it there for a week or more. Missions are preached just as if the cars were cathedrals. Children are baptized, often old enough to be confirmed and some old enough to be married, but frequently they see an altar in the car for the first time. Out of the mission comes the desire to have a little chapel as a beginning. The Society is always ready to help, and usually offers $500. In many cases, the people can only add a few hundred more but, poor as it is, the chapel arises. The chapel cars seldom fail to bring about the establishment of a new mission.

Sometimes this work is done in another way that occurs when the Society's attention is called to a case by the missionary pastor or the bishop. At the present time I do not know of a single request for chapel building, that seemed absolutely necessary, refused by the Society. We have had to postpone some, or hold them over for further consideration (which really meant that we had to wait until we got more money), but in the end every application that showed absolute need of our help was granted. The policy of the Society is very simple—the poorest first. The Executive Committee is directed in making gifts by that simple rule, and we find that the rule works out very successfully.

But there is a big principle behind the work of the Church Extension Society. Its founders believed that it was necessary to cultivate the missionary spirit in the people. This spirit needs the appeal of home missions to make it strong; in fact, we really believe that the Society has contributed the largest part of the work of cultivating the missionary spirit in the United States. The fact that it is obliged to make its appeals through the mails, personal visits and its magazine, forces upon it an expense for promotion between five and six per cent. of its receipts; and sometimes we are tempted to say that this is to be regretted, because it would be less expensive to have parish organizations. Still, there is something to be said on the other side: since every bit of literature sent out is a spiritual tract. It is giving the missionary message, preaching the missionary gospel and, in its own way, winning people to the cause of God. When you make a lax Catholic take an interest in missions, he is no longer lax. He becomes an enthusiast; and since the whole aim of the Church is to preach the Gospel, the money which is used to make people zealous for the spread of that Gospel, is money that could scarcely be better used. The blessing of a missionary appeal is that it works double: it gets the money and it makes the man. So, although we would be very glad, indeed exceedingly rejoiced, if we could, like other missionary societies, have parish branches and bands, so as to be sure of a regular and fixed income and an inexpensive method of securing it, yet we would even then hesitate to give up our appeals through the mails, and our frequent trips to "see" people who would not be reached in any other way.

The Church Extension Society is organized very much like a business corporation. Its chancellor has general supervision over its work. Its president is practically the chancellor's representative at the helm all the time. Its vice-presidents are assigned to departments, and each is responsible for his own work and does not interfere with that of his neighbor. Its accounts are kept like the accounts of any business concern. Follow-up systems, card systems, adding machines, addressing machines and every other aid to accuracy and good work are installed. Even its stationery is given consideration, with an eye to how it may feel to the touch of a possible patron when he pulls it out of the envelope, and how much of an appeal neatness and good typewriting will make upon his interest. Regular meetings of department heads are held to thresh over little things that might produce big things if they were properly looked after. Employees are taken not because they are recommended by friends, but because they show promise; and are kept only when the indications are that they are going to grow up with the work. A point is made to have even the youngest employee deeply interested. A big day's mail, which means a big day's work, always brings out smiles, because it also means a big day's success for something in which everybody around is interested. The accounts of the Society are audited every three months by certified public accountants. Annual reports are presented to the Board of Governors, and forwarded to Rome, where they have always received praise and have drawn out letters of commendation. Summaries of these reports have always been printed, sometimes in book form, and given to those interested; and even sometimes sent out at considerable expense, with an eye to results in dollars; for the reports, like all the other literature, must bring returns, or why spend money on them?

The present unfortunate situation in Mexico has shown another field of usefulness for the Society, which has been very generally recognized, especially by the bishops. The Society took up the cause of the exiled Mexican prelates and priests, secured $50,000, established a seminary to take care of the students, is establishing a Spanish Catholic paper now to make up for the destroyed Catholic press of Mexico, and is caring in general, at the request of the Mexican bishops, for the interests of the Church in that afflicted country. The usefulness of the Church Extension Society, in this special need, was because of its flexible organization, which can take up a great cause or question of this kind very quickly and very effectively, having at its command the means of reaching the people, the machinery for collecting, and a safe and sound method of checking disbursements. I believe that those who know, will say that it was a blessing for Mexico that the Church Extension Society existed when the trouble came about.

To sum up: in its nine years of work, the Society has collected and disbursed for missions and for the promotion of missions, over $1,500,000 in cash, and in property and securities over $300,000.

It has built over 1,000 chapels and it is building them still, at the rate, as stated, of three a week. It is educating students. It has established a seminary. It has three chapel cars and two motor chapels. It distributes nearly a million pieces of Catholic literature every year. It has established the most widely circulated Catholic magazine in the United States which, conservatively, is worth about $200,000. It has a children's magazine with 20,000 subscribers. It has done its share toward developing the missionary spirit in the country and is continuing to do it. It has tried to build itself up in a business-like way, and to keep its management in business-like control. It has never let anything get away from it that it thought was any good. It has not always been modest, but it has found that advertising pays. In a word, it has worked things out according to the original plans which were approved of by wise men; and in thus working, believes it has obtained a little wisdom for itself. No one of its members has personally profited through his connection with the Society. There has been no distribution of rewards and no cause for punishment. The Society was needed. It was thoughtfully planned out. It was kept within the straight and narrow way. It was a vehicle for the advancement of no man's ambitions; but for the advancement of the Kingdom of Jesus Christ. It was blessed by the Pope and it was blessed by the poor. That is all.

So this is our little speech; and if you are pleased with it—well, you know what to do. FRANCIS C. KELLEY, President.

The "Outlook's" "Correction"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

You have doubtless known people in this world whose apologies are more offensive than the original misdeed. I am compelled to call your attention to the way in which the Outlook makes "correction" of its statement of the facts concerning the "Achilli trial." In the issue of March 24 I find the following:

> In an editorial statement relating to bills before the last Congress, which, if passed, would give the Postmaster-General power to exclude from the mails any periodical which he might decide to be libelous as to church organizations, we reported the statement of a witness before the Congressional committee which was considering these bills, relating to the trial of Cardinal Newman for alleged libel against Father Achilli. The witness, Dr. Williams, stated that Newman was convicted of the libel and was fined £12,000. A correspondent calls our attention to the fact that this is a mistake. The facts as stated in Dr. Wilfrid Ward's "Life of Cardinal Newman" and in the "Encyclopedia Britannica" are, that he was fined £100, but that his expense for the trial was something like £14,000. Of course, the question of the amount of the fine does not at all affect the principle involved. (The italicization is mine.)

You will remember that I pointed out in your issue for March 27 that the facts of the Achilli trial when correctly stated—in the "Catholic Encyclopedia"—proved exactly the opposite of what the Outlook and Dr. Williams thought they proved. The facts were that the polecat Achilli grossly libelled the Church; Newman told the facts about the polecat; the polecat prosecuted Newman for criminal libel; the jury convicted Newman and he was fined £100 and costs; the Times sharply criticized the verdict as tending to show that Catholics had good reason to assert that there was no justice for them in cases tending to arouse the Protestant feelings of judges and juries.

I wrote the editor of the Outlook to the same effect. And now this "Christian" paper in the face of these facts publishes the "correction" quoted above!

I hesitate to characterize this sort of thing as it ought to be characterized in the interest of truth. But I think it is really necessary to point out that as an example of the "strictly Protestant" habit of mind with its bad logic, bad scholarship and bad taste the Outlook's treatment of this matter leaves little to be desired.

New York. THOMAS F. WOODLOCK.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In recent issues of your paper I have noticed some correspondence discussing the statement of the Outlook and others "that the existing laws are quite sufficient to protect the Roman Catholic Church and its priests and clergy from any scurrilous and libelous attacks which may be made against them by unscrupulous partisan journals." We have recently had an illustration in Nova Scotia of the efficiency of our laws.

Some time ago a paper of the Menace class published the bogus Knights of Columbus Oath. The Knights, acting on the advice of the very best legal talent in the province, took action for libel before a Supreme Court judge. The defence urged a demurrer, and the case was brought before the full bench, consisting of five judges, all Protestants. The judges unanimously conceded that, beyond all doubt, the publication was a most atrocious libel, but, in spite of this, the court, one judge only dissenting, dismissed the case, alleging as a reason that it was not, at the beginning, brought before the proper tribunal. The Knights wish to continue the prosecution, but are advised by eminent lawyers that it will be useless expense, as the animus of the judges make it clear that they will never be at a loss for some technicality to save the Protestant clergyman who publishes the paper from the punishment which would certainly be meted out to a Catholic priest were he guilty of a similar offence.

The Time of Death

In AMERICA of March 6 Father Coppens, S.J., criticized some opinions in "A Little Book of Comfort in Time of War," by Edward Ingram Watkin. Father Coppens quoted with italics the following objectionable statements:

> As Catholics, we possess absolute certainty that every death on a blood-drenched field of battle was ordained from all eternity, as the best provision for each man who there lost his life. God, foreknowing all that each would be and do, decreed that the thread of his individual life should be so interwoven with the web of public history as to break off at that particular point of time, for so it would be best for that soldier's immortal soul. Even if the man in question should alas! be lost eternally, even so would this remain true, for had he lived longer, he would have added to his sin, and therefore to the intensity of his punishment.

The second part of Father Coppens' criticism is not so plain as it might be. He says: "It is certainly not revealed that no one who is lost would not have been saved by God's grace if he had lived longer; nor is there any argument from reason to make such a statement probable. Rather the contrary is the case." Now these two sentences of Father Coppens were written to show that the last sentence in the quotation from Mr. Watkin is doctrinally objectionable, even on grounds of reason, for he says: "Nor is there any argument from reason to make such a statement probable. Rather the contrary is the case." Therefore I conclude Father Coppens has reasons so strong for proving his view that the other would not even be probable at all. I think the readers of AMERICA would all be benefited if Father Coppens would write an article clearing up all the difficulties surrounding this point of the doctrine of grace. For very many people think, though of course not with the absolute certainty of divine and Catholic faith, that it is a good, pious opinion to hold, and not a little reasonable also, that God would be acting in accordance with His infinite mercy and goodness if He did cut short the career of a sinner who He foresaw would not make use of grace and would go on abusing it and so increase the intensity of his punishment. The sentence of Mr. Watkin might be interpreted that way.

Though it is not the common teaching, do not some few theologians hold that it is even probable that God, at a definite point in an obdurate sinner's life, does withdraw His grace altogether? This opinion, of course, goes a good deal further than Mr. Watkin's. As long as even the most obdurate sinner lives God does not abandon him so that it could be said there was no hope of forgiveness and that despair would be justified. In other words, there is always sufficient grace. If the sinner wills to cooperate with it he can be saved. But the point under discussion does not concern a sinner living on deprived of sufficient grace, but rather a sinner cut off in his sins because God in His mercy so decreed, seeing by His infallible foreknowledge that if He allowed that sinner to live longer and gave him other sufficient graces, that sinner would still freely refuse to cooperate with the grace of God and so go on sinning and increasing his punishment, "treasuring up to himself wrath, against the day of wrath."

St. Paul, Minn. J. C. H.

[In answer to the foregoing Father Coppens says:

A kindly and gentlemanly critic, in a detailed letter to your esteemed paper, referring to a communication of mine published in your number of March 6, says: "I think the readers of AMERICA would be all benefited if Father Coppens would write an article clearing up all the difficulties surrounding this point of the doctrine of grace." I must humbly confess that I do not consider myself capable of writing an article that would clear up all the difficulties surrounding this point of the doctrine of grace. It would be rash for me to attempt it. My modest purpose in the brief communication referred to was to correct the misstatement that every man dies at the time it is best for him to die, even though he be damned. My critic does not deny this, my main contention. But he asks whether I mean to deny the reasonableness of holding the pious opinion that "God would be acting in accordance with His infinite mercy and goodness if He did cut short the career of a sinner who, He foresaw, would not make use of grace, and would go on abusing it, and so increase the intensity of his punishment."

The question is not what God in His mercy might do if He wished, but what He has let us know He actually does in the present order of Providence. Now He has told us clearly, in equivalent terms, that Judas was eternally lost after a number of mortal sins, while his life might have been taken from him after fewer sins or before he committed any mortal sins at all. The statement, then, or opinion, that God always cuts short the career of a sinner who, as He foresees, would only increase his sins and his eternal punishment is not even probable, for Christ has told us it is not true. Would my gentle critic himself consider it probable that all the Jews who exclaimed, during Christ's sacred passion, "Crucify Him!" are better off for all eternity than if they had died some years sooner? There are vast numbers of obdurate sinners in all ages: is it probable that all of them die when it is best for them? God, no doubt, takes many out of life lest they accumulate more sins, or before they sin at all, as in the case of him of whom the Book of Wisdom says: "He was taken away lest wickedness should alter his understanding or deceit beguile his soul" (Wisdom iv, 11); but there is no solid reason for saying that the Lord always cuts short a man's life because He foresees that a longer life would only accumulate sin and increase eternal punishment. When there is no solid reason for an opinion, we can not call it probable.]

A Critic of the Catholic Daily

To the Editor of AMERICA:

No one will question the statement that a high-class daily would be exceedingly useful. So, too, would a hundred other good things, if we could only get them. The question is not its utility, but its feasibility. To the present writer it seems a dream or of stuff that dreams are made of. Mr. Michael McDermot, of Palm Beach, knows a man who is willing to give $1,500,000 unconditionally to a high-class Catholic daily. If Mr. McDermot knows such a benefactor, let him advise the prospective donor to use his money for a more useful purpose. I suggest, for instance, that it be given to the struggling Catholic colleges, or to the Extension Society, or to our impoverished parochial schools, but I don't advise that it be wasted on a Catholic daily which few will read. Think of a daily on the lines of AMERICA with the "requisite adaptations"! Read it? Why the average Catholic would not look at it. This is no reflection on AMERICA, which is by all odds the best Catholic weekly in the country. Though at times a little too academic, it is still something to be proud of. Is it read by the layman? Subtract the priests and the nuns from its subscribers, and I venture to assert that the sheriff will be at the door of the Jesuit Fathers within three months. I am not familiar with the finances of AMERICA, but I would wager a good deal, if I had it, that, after expenses are paid, little is left for salaries. I'd wager that if the Editor and his associates were paid for their work AMERICA would soon be bankrupt. Let Mr. McDermot induce that benefactor to give some of his $1,500,000 to the AMERICA Fathers. Let us make AMERICA faultless and flawless. Put it in the power of the editors to get and to give the best, and then it will be time to think of a daily. To accomplish this will require more money than comes in from their none too large list of subscribers.

Surely Mr. McDermot has seldom rubbed shoulder to shoulder with the ordinary American Catholic. High-class daily? Ridiculous! The vast bulk of our people are too hard worked, too tired at night to indulge in the luxury of a high-class paper and too ill-educated to be interested in it. Watch their faces, talk to them, as they pour out of our churches on Sunday, and you will soon be convinced that what I say is true. It is the church-goers surely who would be expected to read the high-class Catholic daily, not the hardy annuals or absentees. Go through the rooms of the Knights of Columbus, visit our various Catholic societies and you will find that the pool-room and not the reading-room is in highest favor. Scan the lists in the public libraries and see how few Catholics, judging at least from the names, are taking out books. This is no reflection upon our Catholic people; they are the best and the noblest in the land. We have not had time yet, as a class, to become educated. I think Lowell has said, it takes at least three generations to make a gentleman. It might be added that, as a certain percentage of educated Catholics have married Protestants or have eschewed our Catholic colleges and been trained at non-sectarian universities, we may presume that a Catholic daily will have few attractions for them. They hardly appreciate the Faith, since they've exposed their own and their children's to such dangers.

What we need is to push, popularize and perfect AMERICA. The weeklies have the tremendous circulation in the country: the Saturday Evening Post, 2,000,000; Collier's, 187,000. It is the weekly that our poor Catholic, tired out after his week's work, would have time to read and time to ponder over, not the ephemeral daily which he merely scans. When we have made a success of a great weekly and educated our people more, then let us talk of a high-class daily.

New York. George Carver.

Catholics in the Y. M. C. A.

To the Editor of America:

And now comes Mr. Farrell to the assistance of Mr. McCloskey, deprecating Mr. Hume's charge of disloyalty leveled at that class of young men which Mr. McCloskey represents. He resents the use of sarcasm and crisp retort. Read again with me the opening sentence of Mr. McCloskey's letter: "I have been sometimes amused and more often angered by the articles I read in Catholic periodicals regarding the 'baneful' influence of the Y. M. C. A. on its Catholic members." Could one give expression to a thought better calculated to draw forth the most stinging sarcasm? Catholic papers and periodicals are published to enlighten people at large and to reach, by the printed word, those who are not reached by the spoken word. They are edited by men who are qualified to supervise the publication of the latest thought on questions of interest to Catholics. Their editors and contributors come from the class best qualified to speak authoritatively on such questions, and when they all agree (and I think Mr. McCloskey will admit that they do) that the Y. M. C. A. is no place for a Catholic young man, it is safe to conclude that if, as Mr. Farrell says, Mr. Hume is "a master in the Church," he has plenty of company.

On the question of loyalty let me relate an instance that has come to my personal notice. A Catholic young man, who by the way is an office man and needs the exercise, was induced to join the Y. M. C. A. under pressure of the argument that he should devote a part of his time to physical exercise, and the "Y," of course, afforded the only opportunity in our city. Later on, discovering that a Catholic, though a member of the "Y," could have no voice in determining the policies of that institution, he promptly withdrew and, despite three or four personal visits from the secretary, he continued in his determination to sever his connection with the "Y." I submit this, first, as a study in comparisons and, secondly, I would like to press the query: Does Mr. McCloskey, Mr. Farrell or any one else imagine for a moment that this secretary was actuated in his persistence purely and simply by a desire to bring only physical benefit to this erstwhile member? No; as Mr. Hume points out, the undersurface method of proselyting in vogue in the Y. M. C. A. is the danger that every Catholic man should avoid. And when a man admits that he is moved to anger when advised of that danger, he can not, nor any one for him, complain if his loyalty is called in question. Anger of this sort is an evidence of weakness and, in this case, a recognition of his weak defence. Mr. McCloskey's anger should give place to an earnest appeal, and that, coupled with his own endeavor to correct the condition, will soon afford the relief demanded. If he is at all acquainted with the trend of the Catholic lay movement, he knows that this very condition is receiving the attention of the laity, right now, and has been. His province is not to defend aggressively but to assist aggressively. It is an error for him to defend Catholic membership in the Y. M. C. A., and Mr. Farrell is in error when he says that "he (Mr. McCloskey) has a perfect right, under the circumstances noted in his letter, to avail himself of the privileges of his membership." No man has any right to place himself where he will encounter a danger to his faith, and if, perchance, he finds himself so located, even though through no fault of his own, he should persist in trying to remove the danger and, so long as he persists, we are justified in believing that his faith will not suffer. And herein lies the answer to the comparison drawn by Mr. Farrell in his letter in America's issue of March 27.

So now, let us admit that, among our young men, there is need of swimming-pools, etc., for their accommodation and physical uplift, my idea of real loyalty to Holy Church in this matter is that such enthusiasts as Mr. McCloskey should take the lead in securing that ideal and, through the merits of their enthusiasm and success, win the friends through whose cooperation such accommodations may be realized. In this way will they render a service, not only to themselves, but to their brother, and by their very success they will remove one of the strongest drawing cards which the proselyter possesses.

If we were to attach to the Methodist, Baptist or to any other Protestant Church the athletic attractions exploited by the Y. M. C. A., I am sure that Mr. Farrell would not encourage the Catholic youths to join. And his reasoning against the acceptance of membership under such conditions would exactly correspond to the reasoning advanced by Mr. Hume in the case of the "Y."

We quote Mr. Farrell: "The question is not whether a loyal Catholic can be an associate member, but rather why are there so many loyal Catholics enrolled in the Y. M. C. A.? It must exert a strong appeal to produce so large a response." Mr. Farrell, let me remind you that temptation has always been, and ever shall be, a sugar-coated pill. It always comes to one dressed in a most fascinating garb. Joining of the Y. M. C. A. "over parental objection and the maturer applicant's own reluctance" is disobedience pure and simple, for, if a reluctance exists, it is evident that the applicant's own conscience is asserting itself, and overthrow of the conscience creates at least the semblance of disobedience.

Now to summarize: my belief is that the proper thing for an athletic young man is not to join the "Y.," but rather to assist in bringing about in Catholic social circles those legitimate opportunities of which he wishes to take advantage. For him to join the "Y" only detracts from the possibility of obtaining our mutual desires. For him to refuse to join, even though he does not extend a helping hand, gives strength to the movement for Catholic "gyms," and if he will add his effort to the efforts of those who are in favor of Catholic "gyms," the more certain shall we be of getting them: far better occupation than to be enlisted in an aggressive defence of Catholic membership in the Y. M. C. A. Success comes not to divided forces, but, on the contrary, it perches upon the standards of real organization bent on preserving to the Church "the flower of her youth."

Monmouth, Ill. John J. Ryan.

To the Editor of America:

Mr. Farrell's letter in last week's America has caused a most disagreeable impression among many of my friends. The discussion about Catholic membership in the Y. M. C. A. has outgrown the boyish effusion of its first exponent, and now seems to be striking at fundamental principles. The question has been asked, Is Mr. Farrell a Catholic, or a secret agent of the Y. M. C. A. who thus slyly is trying to obtain new members from among the ranks of the Catholic faithful? Since his letter appeared, it has been remarked a number of times in my hearing that it would have the effect of confirming lukewarm Catholics in their resolve to avail themselves of any attraction, however insidious, as long as the Church has not directly and explicitly condemned it.

It seems almost a pity that the letter of Mr. Farrell appeared alone in America, since many who read that number will not see any refutation, and it was dogmatic enough to be the decree of a plenipotentiary. He complains that Mr. Hume sets himself up as a teacher without any ecclesiastical authorization. If Mr. Farrell received a papal commission to champion the organization which he defends, he should submit his credentials. Possibly he never heard the Gospel text which warns us about scrutinizing the mote in our neighbor's eye and overlooking the beam in our own.

His comparison of the position of members in the Y. M. C. A. with that of British subjects is absurd to any one who knows that Catholics are not debarred from any position in the kingdom except the Crown, which is, of course, hereditary. It is not long since we had a Catholic Lord Chief Justice, and recently there was a succession of Catholic Lord Mayors of London.

Possibly Mr. Farrell did not intend the impression which his letter has created and, if so, I apologize for my vehemence. But if he did not, he should write again at once, and try to repair some of the harm he has unwittingly (?) wrought.

Rosslyn, Va. H. L. SEARS, M.D.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The letter that recently appeared from your Baltimore correspondent about the Y. M. C. A. was even more of a surprise than that of Mr. McCloskey. If the writer only saw it, the letter had a decidedly uncatholic ring about it and makes splendid capital for lukewarm Catholics and the Y. M. C. A. Let me call attention to a few of the fallacies in this letter:

Fallacy 1. "To charge him with disloyalty and to cast suspicion upon his faith because he avails himself of the only means at hand to meet his legitimate need is unwarranted, and beyond the point at issue." The writer forgot an important item: The means themselves must be legitimate. The starving Irish of Famine days had a legitimate need of food and the only means at their disposal were the Protestant soup-kitchens. Shall we draw the conclusion?

Fallacy 2. "The historical toleration of the Church which, though always aiming primarily at the spiritual welfare of the faithful, does not curtail needlessly their material opportunities." Truer word never was spoken. But she does curtail and must curtail and will always curtail them when they conflict with matters of faith.

Fallacy 3. "Mr. McCloskey and his fellows are the victims of changed economic conditions." So were the Irish lads of Penal days, so were the Roman lads before them, so were the English lads of half a century ago, who were forbidden Oxford and Cambridge by the Holy See. Does not the correspondent see that again he is justifying the means by the end?

Fallacy 4. "The question is not whether a loyal Catholic can be an associate member but rather why there are so many loyal Catholics enrolled in the Y. M. C. A. . . . There must be a real need for some such organization." Of course there is need, so was there need for food to the starving Irish, but the soup-kitchen was no legitimate remedy. So is there need for fraternal organizations, but Masonry and the I. O. O. F. are not legitimate means.

Fallacy 5. "Fallacy" is a feeble name for the misuse of Pope Benedict's words. Our Holy Father is speaking only of those open questions which are disputable points in Catholic theology, and have not been settled by the Church. I claim that the Y. M. C. A. is not a disputable point, and its status has been settled by the Church. It is not disputable, because it insults Catholics, is decidedly dangerous, and is a Protestant religious society. It insults Catholics for it classes them with non-Christians, Jews and Unitarians. The man to whom alone Christ Crucified is made a vital reality, is allowed the use of "gym." and swimming-pool and track, provided he allows himself to be classed as non-Christian, as one who does not acknowledge Jesus Christ as God. Proof? Read the By-laws and Constitutions of the Y. M. C. A.—Catholic Mind, March 22.

The Y. M. C. A., moreover, is decidedly dangerous for the organization is permeated with a spirit of indifferentism, the deadliest enemy of a vigorous Catholic spirit. One can maintain one's faith against open attack but rare is the man whose faith will not be worn to nothing by the constant attrition of the one-religion-as-good-as-another sophism. That this is the Y. M. C. A. spirit is abundantly evident from even a casual acquaintance. Its religious aspect is essential. It grew from the Bible class of George Williams of England, and it is "the distinctly religious character of the movement more than anything else that has contributed to its permanence.—Report of Jubilee Convention, Boston, 1901. It is a Protestant organization for the propagation of Protestant views "maintaining the Holy Scriptures to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice."—Portland Resolution. Is it a disputable point with Catholics whether they can help spread heresy?

Lastly, the Y. M. C. A. position has been decided by the Church. The Pope, to be sure, has not given any infallible pronouncement, but that is not the only way the Church tells us what we should do and hold as Catholics. Other ways are the consent of the faithful and the teaching of her pastors. The faithful at large consistently and instinctively recognize Y. M. C. A. enrollment as something quite at variance with Catholicism. Catholic members of the Y. M. C. A., moreover, have been witness to this opposition by their constant apologetic attitude; they feel their position needs defence. Again the pastors of the Church have spoken. They warn the young men of their flocks against the Y. M. C. A.; they admittedly thwart that organization and are expected to do so by its officials.

One point in closing. A Catholic may be permitted by his confessor for grave reasons to join the Y. M. C. A., but in this case special precautions must be taken by the Catholic to protect himself against the insidious atmosphere of his surroundings. But that is toleration, pure and simple, in an individual case, and the associates are enjoying a privilege no good Catholic desires. I hope the day is not far off when the Y. M. C. A. will cease to be a lure to young Catholics because we shall possess our own gymnasiums. Till then, let us have manly self-respect enough to stand by our Catholic heritage and be willing to pay the cost of being Catholics.

New York. S. L. JONES.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Regarding the suggestion that our pastors should start in their parishes well-equipped gymnasiums for Catholic young men, we can hardly ask the Church to do this for us. She gives us such an excellent spiritual training that we should be able to despise the efforts of the proselyter to undermine our faith. But this tender mother, knowing the needs of her children and realizing that their physical training must be left in the hands of her laity, looks with sorrow on those self-complacent societies affiliated with the Church who pay no attention to this physical education of our young men.

When Catholic laymen devote their time and efforts only to establishing second-class club rooms and paying death benefits while our youths must seek physical training in gymnasiums supposedly tainted with Protestantism, can not these laymen be justly charged with shirking their duty?

The Y. M. C. A., recognizing that high morality can best be attained by means of physical training, began to establish gymnasiums and this movement has attained world-wide success. Why so successful? Because the need was so great. Meanwhile what have we Catholics been doing? Sitting impotently by, muttering against the Y. M. C. A.'s success; one by one deserting the ranks of the malcontents to join the Association's gymnasiums as our need became personal. The Catholic young man has been made to feel that the Catholic laity ignores the wants and cravings of its youths. Therefore the young man must go where this recreation can be found outside the Church, provided, however, he can enjoy such advantages without endangering his religious belief.

When he applies at the Y. M. C. A. he is asked: "What is your religion?" On his answering, "Catholicism," he is not asked: "If we place you on our swimming team will you at least listen to our religious doctrines?" Or, "If you are hypnotized by external hospitality or shown any mark of special favor, will you tell your Catholic friends about it?"

No. He is asked: "Are you a good, practical Catholic? for we recognize a bad Catholic not only harms himself but is of no value to the association to which he is allied." Has a Catholic member of the Y. M. C. A. ever heard his religion belittled in their halls? Has any Catholic been approached argumentatively by any Y. M. C. A. official? Since the courts have decreed that the Y. M. C. A. is an educational institution rather than a religious one, and since, while safeguarding our own faith, we must accept from others what our own Catholic laity so shamefully neglect to provide us with, let us cease to rail at an unavoidable state of things.

Let Catholic members of the Y. M. C. A. pay for what they get from that organization. Surely any good Catholic can safeguard himself against the wiles of Protestantism should any appear. We must not blame the Church for the present conditions. They are due to the culpable neglect of the Catholic laity. Meanwhile we Catholic members of the Y. M. C. A. should force that organization to give us a just share in its government or, failing to secure that right, let us interest others in the foundation of a Young Men's Catholic Association. That would be a more profitable course than with only second-hand knowledge, writing to Catholic magazines about the baneful influence of the Y. M. C. A. on its Catholic members.

Philadelphia. Leo Paul McCloskey.

Is Anti-Catholicism an Anachronism?

To the Editor of America:

"A Ludicrous Anachronism," in your issue of February 20, interested me very much. I do not at all agree with Rev. Father Bull, and I think, in his answer (March 6) to Mr. Ronald, he is playing with words. True, Cotton Mather and his views would cut a strange figure on Broadway to-day, and if he got too boisterous about "Papists," some good Irish policeman might tap Cotton on the head to wake him up. But our anti-Catholicism of to-day would open Cotton's eyes; it is very different from the platform of his day.

What are some of the big things our Catholic leaders and Catholic press have been hammering at for years past? First, there is our American school system. Has it "injured Catholics, as Catholics"? (This, according to Father Bull, is what is required to make bigotry.) This system has injured Catholics to the extent that they have felt bound in conscience to build over 5,000 schools of their own, for God is being driven from our public schools. Did our broad-minded Americans do this? They are paying millions a year to help it along. "The thing behind the secularization of the schools," says Mr. Bird Coler, "is socialism." Socialism is a pretty big factor in this country. Is it anti-Catholic? We all know the answer. Then you have the famous Carnegie Fund. Has it injured Catholics as Catholics? No Catholic College that is true to its principles can touch a penny of it and, with few exceptions, none of our fair-minded Americans have protested.

Then there was the great Peace Conference. Did it injure Catholics as Catholics? It was a gross insult to millions of Catholics the world over; it left out him who represents here on earth the Prince of Peace. Again, there is the national daily press. Does it injure Catholics as Catholics? Is it even fair to Catholics? Its silence is at times crushing. Did it raise its powerful voice for the stricken Catholics of Mexico? Why not? But a year or two ago, however, it denounced, in furious tones, the persecution of the Jews in Russia. There are our State institutions of higher learning. Is any restraint put upon the tongues of professors who teach doctrines subversive of our faith? Are we not helping to support these institutions? Look again at our mail system. Are we injured here as Catholics? Father Bull seems to insinuate that the "open vileness of the Menace" is not a very subtle danger to contend with. Well, the filthy sheet may not be very subtle, but what about the Government that allows the distribution of the most scurrilous libels against all we hold dear? We Catholics are told there is no protection here against this ghastly indignity. Mr. Sunday got redress after one complaint against an objectionable cartoon; Catholics have made about a quarter of a million complaints, and the answer of the postal authorities, according to America of March 6, is only a smile. Why the difference?

Of course, while we go creeping along quietly, thanking everybody for being fair-minded toward us, we are not apt to be bothered. But start a Holy Name parade in Philadelphia and you must go into the courts to prove to some loyal Americans that Sunday band playing of religious airs is not a violation of the Sabbath. Or start another in Pittsburg and ecclesiastical authorities deem it prudent for one year at least to forego the procession in order to avoid friction. Let a few companies of small boys in regimentals turn out to welcome a Catholic Governor and you have a well-known paper trumpeting about Catholic boys being trained in the use of arms "in these days when there is so much sensitiveness upon race and religious matters." The Church refused to grant a divorce and you hear of Roman tyranny destroying individual liberty. Lastly, look at the clause barring "wines for sacramental purposes" in one of our recent "dry State" enactments.

The press, the pulpit, the platform, the schoolroom (the very heart of the nation to be), the State universities, the theaters, the literature of the land, the widespread socialistic spirit—these are the agencies that have influence; these are the things that form public opinion. They certainly are anti-Catholic. They reach the "man in the street" and the factory hand, the club man and the society woman, and Catholicism is ignored. True, it is not the brick-bat system; oh, no! they don't come in mobs to burn our churches, nor to tear down our homes and burn our convents. The anti-Catholic spirit of to-day is too wise for this. It smiles on you, goes hand in hand with you, and makes speeches from flag-decked stands and tells how much it loves liberty and religious freedom; and while you are agreeing and bowing, it quietly but surely ignores everything Catholic. Keep your eyes on the big movements of the country, movements which are supposed to be for all the people, and see how much attention is paid to Catholic interests. You may call this bigotry. Father Bull does not want to give it this name. "Peace be to him!" Call it non-bigotry, positive or negative bigotry; define it as being "anti-Catholic," and distinguish it, and show that others suffer, too (though they don't seem to worry much about it); but you can't get away from the fact that the big influencing agencies of this country have no regard for Catholicism; they ignore it, they snub it. If all this is "A Ludicrous Anachronism," then what is the meaning of the constantly repeated talk about Catholic organization, Catholic schools, a Catholic press, Catholic federations and so on? What on earth is it all for if not to fight the anti-Catholic wave of influence that is dechristianizing this country?

CABLE ADDRESS: CATHREVIEW

The Church's Easter Message

EASTER Sunday, this year, has given eloquent testimony to the fact that faith is waning in the United States. Half-filled Protestant churches, dechristianized pulpits, colorless non-committal sermons were the order of the day. Many a preacher congratulated himself on the day of Christ's Resurrection with having skilfully avoided all reference either to Christ, or His divinity, or His triumph over Death. Not that some of the pastors did not feel a twinge of conscience over their cowardly silence, for many of the pastors have not advanced as far as their flocks. They felt, however, that it would be more prudent, more expedient to steer a safe course, and not to insist on a mere dogma with which many of their congregation had lost sympathy. As a consequence they did not talk on faith or the crowning proof of faith.

In direct contrast with this outstanding fact was the character of the sermons preached in our Catholic churches. In them all emphasis was laid on the reasonableness of our faith, as viewed in the light of the Son of God's Resurrection. "Christ has risen as He said." Our faith therefore is not vain. Our faith is our trial, but it is at the same time our priceless privilege, a privilege that every day is becoming more exclusively our own.

The trial of the Christian is faith. Things he has not seen he believes not foolishly but wisely, on the word of Christ. In the midst of scoffers at things divine, in spite of the allurement of things of sense, he holds his gaze steadfastly toward the things of the spirit. He is content to wait for fullness of knowledge about the Resurrection of his Lord until he shall see Him face to face in the Kingdom of the Father. Not the doubting Thomas but the faithful Paul is his model. The foundation of his life is the word of Revelation, its staff is prayer and the sacraments, its hope is the vision, not present but deferred, of the unseen God. He knows that his Redeemer liveth, and that in the last day he shall rise out of the earth, shall be clothed once more in flesh and with his own eyes shall look into the eyes of Christ, his friend. The bitter-sweet of the joys of time are not, therefore, the anxious object of his thought, although he admits their insistent charm. His preoccupation is the overmastering desire that he may be true to the end, that when his years shall have fled and left as much trace as the flight of the bird, he may be able to say with the Apostle that he has kept the faith. If he is wise, he realizes that is not easy. The world, in which he must live, is a constant temptation. There is no heart so spiritual that is not in danger. What wonder, if with all those about him incredulous, he too should cease to believe! What guarantee has he that he shall be faithful where so many others, stronger and better than he, have proved false? Yet it is none the less true that the just man lives by faith. Only he that perseveres to the end shall be saved.

Trade Unionists in Socialist Schools

SOCIALISM has long been active in seeking to promote its ideals among American women of every rank and condition. It has labored with zeal to spread its doctrines among the middle and leisured classes in social and suffrage clubs, among pupils and teachers in educational establishments, and particularly among the members of women's trade unions. The radicalism which pervades our modern feminist literature is an admirable preparation for such propaganda. One of its most important recent successes has been achieved in the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. It is the first step toward a movement which socialists have long sought to bring about: the education of labor unionists in socialist schools.

The union in question is one of the largest labor organizations in the United States. A number of its members have just completed a course of instruction in the history and theory of the labor movement, given by socialist teachers in a socialist school, and at the expense of the labor union. The attention of the students is at present devoted to practical work, and they are being carefully drilled in the art of public and extemporaneous speaking. The purpose of the New York Socialist school, to whose skilled agitators these women have been entrusted, is to send them back to their unions deep-dyed and efficient socialist propagandists. The teaching of history by socialist instructors and through socialist literature means nothing more nor less than a clever attempt to square all human events with the materialistic doctrines of socialistic determination. The socialist theory of the labor movement is woven from the same loom. Nothing can justify such an action on the part of any union. It is a sacrifice of all sane principles of trade unionism to the spirit of class-hatred and radicalism. That such a step has been taken by the Ladies' Garment Workers is not surprising. The danger is that similar attempts may meet with success elsewhere.

Catholic laborers of every kind are surrounded with countless difficulties and dangers. We can not, therefore, be too zealous in offering them the assistance so necessary at the present moment. The welfare of the entire movement largely depends upon Catholic workers. It is their mission to inject Catholic doctrines into the labor movement. To be able to do this they themselves should get Catholic social instruction. Here is a mission to which the Holy See has frequently called attention.

"Everybody's" Christian

THERE was recently organized in Everybody's Magazine a competition which had certain elements of uniqueness, being nothing less than an invitation to answer the question, "What is a Christian?" From the five thousand and more answers received a synthetic definition of the term has been built up, which has this of interest about it: it shows what the general idea of Christianity in modern America is, and, incidentally, leads back to the older question: "Whom do men say that the Son of Man is?"

Christians of the present day are evidently to be divided into two classes, the old-fashioned and the modern. The former believe in the historic Christ; that is, in Jesus Christ, who was born of the Virgin Mary, was crucified, buried, and rose from the dead; in short, they believe the Creeds, and are known as Catholics. The modern Christians believe in the "Christ of faith," in other words, in Christ as an ethical ideal, as an inspiration, aptly epitomized in the words of Everybody's synthesis: "If (a man) is perfectly moral he need not believe anything about Christ to be a Christian." It is the Christianity of the Catholics which, according to Mr. Winston Churchill, needs to be in harmony with modern science in order to be rescued.

Here is a twentieth century exemplification of the saying, vox populi vox Dei, which may be translated, "the biggest crowd that shouts the loudest is invariably in the right." But against this is the witness of a society which has borne a continuous testimony since the day when Christ said on Mount Olivet, "As the Father hath sent me, even so send I you," down to the day when Pope Benedict XV called the whole Catholic world to prayer for peace. We do not apologize for the Catholic Church; we do not apologize for God. It is sufficient to point to an institution that teaches precisely the same doctrine it taught nearly two thousand years ago; which has embraced the learning of the ages, and ask, in the name of ordinary common sense, why its teachings need to be reconciled with modern science, whose chief function is the recording of observed facts, the very terms of which are more or less in dispute on account of the fluctuation of present-day philosophical nomenclature.

The root and ground of the difficulty is that the modern lay theologian has got ahead too fast; he needs to think upon the first article of his creed (?) "I believe," and having defined belief, the rest will fall into its proper place. In the whole realm of human thought there is, perhaps, no act more akin to pure faith than the acceptance of the description of ether. The Church possesses the testimony of eye-witnesses who touched and saw the historic Christ, but no man at any time has seen or touched ether or can describe it satisfactorily, yet what is modern science without it? Whence it comes to pass Christianity appeals more strongly to the intellect than a great deal of our modern science. And yet the former must yield to the latter!

Catholics and the Scriptures

THE introduction into the New York State legislature of a bill to make obligatory the reading of some verses from the Bible as the first daily exercise in the public schools, was by no means a surprising or unusual procedure. It has come to be an annual event for our legislators to discuss or repeal that particular measure, and doubtless the custom will go on for years to come. One of the regrettable consequences of this perennial incident is the fact that it is made the occasion for the reiteration of the old, many times refuted calumny that Catholics are opposed to the reading of the Holy Scripture. We quote from the letter of one of our correspondents an instance of the kind of writing to which the bill invariably gives rise:

> The Reform Bulletin, a small weekly paper published in New York by Rev. O. R. Miller, State Superintendent of the New York Civic League, contains the following statement regarding the proposed bill: "The chief opponents of this bill are the Roman Catholic hierarchy, whose policy has long been to discourage the reading of the Bible by their laity. . . . Evidently they fear for their children to become too familiar with the Bible lest it would make poor Catholics." Well, if the reading of the Protestant Bible would make as many "poor" Catholics as it has made "poor" Protestants, the objection to the reading of it would be well founded. The mutilated Bible is in parts a false translation. Mr. Miller does not seem to know this fact, or the other fact that the Catholic version of the Holy Scriptures can be found in almost every Catholic home, and is quoted every Sunday at the eight or nine Masses said in every large Catholic church in the world.

The remarks of our correspondent are just and correct. The strictures of the Reform Bulletin are almost too absurd to be taken seriously. They do, however, offer an occasion of appealing to Catholics in behalf of more frequent reading of the Bible. Our laity do not read either the New or the Old Testament with the frequency that the Church desires and advises. The Gospels especially should be read oftener. Our people would be more Christlike, if they were more familiar with the works and words of Christ. The Church would be better pleased, were the family Bible more worn with the daily turning of its sacred pages. Christ's Vicar and His bishops are opposed to our children listening to passages taken from a false version of God's Word, but they have only commendation for the frequent perusal of the life of the Saviour, in which there is no danger of wresting the sacred text to their own destruction.

The Short Way Around

WENDELL PHILLIPS was fond of telling the story of a certain Czar of Russia. Taking a map of his country and pointing out to his engineers the two terminals of a proposed railroad, the Czar drew a straight line, let us say, from Petrograd to Tschaikowsky, and said: "There, build the road along that line." If every man had as many subjects as Russia and had the Czar's supreme power, we might abolish Institutes of Technology and blue prints and elaborate specifications, and teach civil engineering and surveying in one lesson by means of a ruler and a lead-pencil. Czars, however, are scarce; mountains are more amenable to dynamite than are men; at least, when they are blown down, mountains can not stand up again. In a word, a straight line may mark the shortest distance between two points in geometry or in Russia, but wherever you have to do with immortal souls, free wills, theoretical minds and dyspeptic stomachs, then not rarely the cut across lots must be avoided, because the longest way around may be often the shortest way home.

This process of indirection, as it might be termed, has been perfected by the Irish and by speakers, and especially by a perfect blend of the two. Alexander may swing a sword and sever the Gordian knot; modern Czars may build railroads by a ukase; the mailed fist of militarism may hit out straight, but poverty, weakness, centuries of persecution must have recourse to other arts. Only one nation has a Blarney Castle; only one people has invented so many terms of endearment and words for the idea of taking a soul—not by storm—not by siege, but almost by surrender of the attacking party. When a person is said to be good at the comether, or to have a wheedling, cajoling, palavering and sootherin' way with him, every one knows his nationality.

Public speaking is so weak in its instruments, having no sword or mailed fist, and public speaking is so often exorbitant in its demands, that it is no wonder it has made a special study of the art of indirection. Speaking must achieve great results by weak means in a brief time. The art of rhetoric should be taught more widely, and many a good parish-priest would receive fewer criticisms if he had more rhetoric. His reproofs would be more effective because more prudent. His appeals for support would have, on his part, more encouragement, more eloquent gratitude, more kindly condescension, and—here's the point—more returns on the part of others. Yet it must be confessed that to insinuate one's way into a pocket book is harder than traveling in lower Belgium or upper France at this writing. Oratory can get a man's vices away from him more easily than it can get his money.

Indirection is not necessarily unworthy toadying; neither does condescension always mean cunning. It is true that the first orators became the first sophists, and that rhetoric and even oratory may make a man suspect, as that famous adept in cleverness, Mark Antony, well knew when he styled himself no orator, but only a plain, blunt speaker. However, the plain, blunt speakers off the stage are usually the arrogant and offensive, who think politeness pettiness and condescension cowardice. The more delicate the machinery the more delicate should be the instrument to touch and handle it. Indirection takes a camel's-hair brush or a gentle breath to clean the works of a watch; bluntness would use a crowbar.

Nothing is more delicate than the soul, nothing more sensitive than freedom. The soft answer is more potent than the thundering ukase. The blustering north wind was defeated in its efforts to tear away the traveler's cloak; a cheerful whisper from the south wind, out of a smiling sky, won the victory. It was the gentle patience of a young religious which mastered a crowd of unruly boys when stronger, more irascible disciplinarians were unsuccessful. What is the best so-called psychotherapy but indirection reduced to a fine art?

LITERATURE

The Poetaster's Friends

THERE come from the press nearly every month nowadays a dozen slender little books of verse, prettily bound and tastefully printed, indeed, but branded, to a volume, with the unpardonable crime of mediocrity. Those most to blame for this regrettable state of things are the poetaster's friends. They have much to answer for. If it were not for their sinful encouragement he would probably have been content to remain till the end of his days an inoffensive member of the choir inaudible whose silence is the comfort of the world. But chancing to discourse one day most eloquently—but in plain prose—on shoes, or ships, or sealing-wax, among a circle of admiring friends, one of them, perhaps, exclaimed rather "bromidically": "You have a ringing message for our day and generation! Would that you could express it in verse!" "I can!" he answers with determination. Whereupon the Muses lament and moan and the slopes of Helicon resound with cries of grief. For that fell resolve means that another poetaster has been made: made, not born, for poets and poetasters are very distant relatives.

Even now the disaster that threatens can be averted if but one judicious friend—only one!—is found who can persuade our minor poet to leave his metrical lucubrations in innocuous manuscript and content himself with reading them on solemn occasions to a very select audience. Dis aliter visum! The verses are read, indeed, but only to a coterie of flatterers who, perhaps, have just dined sumptuously at the poetaster's expense. Like men and women rapt they listen to the reading and, when it is over, throw themselves with streaming eyes at the versifier's feet and piteously implore him—or more often her—not to be cruel enough to withhold from the world such striking and beautiful poems. They entreat him to let the publishers vie with one another for the privilege of bringing out this "epoch-making" volume.

So the poetaster, of course with becoming reluctance, promises to open a correspondence with our representative publishers, discussing type and binding, contracts and copyrights, royalties and advertising: nay, even the translation of his magnum opus into all the European languages, "including the Scandinavian." Much relieved, his admirers then rise from their knees, dry their tears and plead to be honored with a present of an autograph copy of the coming book's first edition.

The minor poet then gathers together his wretched lines, dedicates them, "with permission," to A. B. C., "who was kind enough"—the villain!—"to see some good in them," writes in the distressingly modest preface that the "author ventures to hope the following verses, the fruit of rare hours of leisure in a busy life, may be received with indulgence by the patient reader," and ends with the protest that it is much against his will and only at the urgent entreaty of friends whose literary judgment he values highly that he has consented, etc., etc.

So the neatly typed manuscript of the volume is forthwith dispatched to a publisher, but, strange to say, is promptly returned. Another is tried, and again the book comes back. Then the author, if he is a man of perseverance and does not mind a large stamp bill, collects a highly interesting variety of letters of rejection, ranging from the curt "Declined with thanks" to the more considerate "We wish to express our gratitude for the privilege you gave us of reading your interesting MS. Unhappily, however, the book market" . . .

Chastened by such experiences, our poetaster would now be content to leave the reading public in everlasting ignorance of his verses if friends and relatives would only second even half-heartedly this noble resolution. Far from doing any such thing, however, they protest instead that these selfish publishers should not be allowed to keep the world from harkening to the herald of an entirely new poetry movement. To prevent such a misfortune his misguided friends urge the poetaster to bring out the volume at his own expense. In an evil hour he heeds the counsel, opens negotiations with a venerable publishing house, and in a few months a little book, attractively bound in green and gold, lies on the reviewer's desk.

We know what happens then. A writer in the British Review thus describes the familiar process:

> Sycophantic papers whose policy it is to keep on good terms with publishers praise such points as they can by any means make laudable; the author acclaims the notices as seasoned judgments, cries contempt upon the dullard public that will not buy, and promptly writes another book as bad as the first. A clique of friends shuts him in with a hedge of compliments. He claims the privilege of genius all his life, and dies at length surrounded by his unread works, an unspoken qualis artifex pereo! consoling his spirit.

O the tragic pathos of such an end! But who is the real criminal? Not the poetaster, poor soul, for

> A book's a book, although there's nothing in't.

Not the poetaster, for had he been let alone he would have passed his days in mute and inglorious contentment, and died at last with "all his music in him." No, not the poetaster, but his hollow friends are most to blame, for they wickedly persuaded him that he was a poet, though in reality he was nothing but a poetaster.

REVIEWS

Loneliness? By Robert Hugh Benson. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.35.

The reading of this book leaves somewhat of the impression experienced by Mr. Arthur Benson at the moment of his brother's departure: "It was simply as though he had left the room, when he died—no sense of death, only of life passing on." It seems as if he had come back to talk with us a while about some phases of modern life and their lessons, after his later manner, as in "The Coward," "The Average Man" and "Initiation," and then departed cheerfully, having quieted us with the assured conviction that for all who sacrifice self to maintain the standards of Christ, the question-mark in the title demands a negative answer. It is a story of an English convent girl of ordinary antecedents and appearance but with an extraordinary voice, who is taken up by a family recently ennobled, when she becomes a singer. There are sidelights on snobbery, as in "The Average Man" and "The Coward," and on the religious emptiness of Protestantism; but the matter and manner are quite different. The Merivale heir falls in love with Marion and her music, and Marion's religion succumbs to music and Merivale—while they remain with her. His description of Lohengrin, presented as Wagner conceived it, and other vivid pictures of musical effects again illustrate Mgr. Benson's marvelous versatility. We learn from an admirable review of his character and work in the April Bookman by Rev. Joseph H. McMahon, that he made a scientific study of music toward the end of his career; but he utilizes it in the story, like his many other gifts and acquirements, not for its own sake but merely as an instrument. Music is the most imaginative and spiritual of the arts.

> Therefore it is by far the most exciting of all, and becomes, if the artist is not careful, a kind of forcing-house for the emotions; and a forcing-house, it must be remembered, develops equally all the seeds that happen to be in the soil under treatment.

The reader will prefer to discover for himself how the forcing-house brought a forbidden marriage to the surface and a stronger force arrested its development and transmuted loneliness to joy. He will also find much humor and pathos and keen analysis of character and motives, and a narrative so developed as to hold his interest for its own sake; and only at the end will he realize that he has read a masterly exposition of the Church's authority and the drawing power of grace. "Loneliness?" is a fitting climax to Mgr. Benson's modern novels. There is a peculiar pathos in the final words: "Jesus! My Knight! . . . I am ready now." Soon he spoke them himself for the last time; they were his life's epitome.

Anthology of Magazine Verse for 1914 and Year Book of American Poetry. By William Stanley Braithwaite. Cambridge, Mass.: Issued by W. S. B.

The Congo and Other Poems. By Vachel Lindsay. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

Sword Blades and Poppy Seed. By Amy Lowell. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

The Present Hour. By Percy Mackaye. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

Path Flower and Other Verses. By Olive T. D'Argan. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.25.

Philip the King and Other Poems. By John Masefield. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

We wish Mr. William Butler Yeats would leave our young poets alone. He cheers on Mr. Ezra Pound and the Poetry magazine, of Chicago, to commit all kinds of amazing extravagances. Imagism, vers libre, and polyrhythmic verse are becoming, under the cunningly applied encouragement of Mr. Yeats, a veritable epidemic. Does Mr. Yeats think that American poetry is of an inferior grade, fit only for laboratory trials? Fiat experimentum in corpore vili. Clever Mr. Yeats! He is scanning the horizon for something new, individualistic, revolutionary; and he has a score of young Americans standing on their heads in order to engage his flattering notice.

Mr. Braithwaite exercises rare self-command in his selection from the current verse in American magazines. For we think he has a secret sympathy with bizarre performers. He includes a number of their vagaries in his anthology and rates them, in the reviewer's opinion, too highly in his interesting estimates of the year's publications in verse. Otherwise his book is a notable record of American activity and achievement in the field of poetry.

Mr. Lindsay has fallen under the spell of Mr. Yeats's blandishments. He is trying his best to do something new; and Miss Harriet Monroe is at hand, with a preface, to interpret seeming incongruities as parts of a solemn ritual, the expression of human aspiration for a new art which will "revitalize the world." Mr. Lindsay has an idea, which he believes is new, that poems should be chanted and recited; and in pursuance of his theory he apparently thinks that poems must be constructed after the manner of Gilbertian operas. It is too bad; for Mr. Lindsay clearly has talent.

If Miss Lowell strains after originality of form, it can not be laid at Mr. Yeats's door. For she tells us in a preface that the French poets, especially those of the Parnassian School, have influenced her. It is not easy to see how Hérédia, whose reputation rests mainly on his use of the sonnets, the most rigid of art-forms, can be coupled with M. Paul Fort, the inventor of vers libre, as Miss Lowell's teachers. The author's verse has a certain Gallic deftness and grace. It has also a Gallic license which is repulsive. He who commits a crime is not so bad as he who defends it. Miss Lowell defends hers. "We do not ask the trees to teach us moral lessons," she observes very complacently. The universe, she says, has no morals. Well, neither have her poems: they do not pretend to be better than trees or the universe. Does she really see no difference? A tree can not talk or sing at all: but a man, or a woman, can. And a man, or a woman, can talk or sing obscenely. Is the only crime of the lewd loafer on the street-corner his inability to frame his lascivious concepts in artistic form?

Mr. Percy Mackaye is on the right road. His mental poise seems to be sufficient to guard him from fantastic capering in by-ways. But we get the impression from the "Present-Hour" that he is traveling too fast. Haste is not always a guarantee of progress. A volume largely of war-poems, published within a month or two after the opening of the war, suggests a journalistic expansion of power at the cost of scrupulous cultivation. The suggestion is not altogether destroyed by a careful reading of the poems. But we are left with great respect for the poet's capacity and inspiration. The vein struck in "School" is one we should like to see him occupied with. His antiphonic sonnets in response to Mr. William Watson are very eloquent: but Mr. Watson's rhetoric is a bad influence for young poets.

Miss Dargan and John Masefield both strike the rare note of poetry without going beyond the accepted laws of art. The former would have done better if she had trusted to her own instincts instead of taking hints now and then from Francis Thompson. It is not every one who can wield the club of Hercules. We can overlook the Thompson influence in "Path Flower"; but not in "Magdalen to Her Poet," which has Thompson's mannerisms with little or none of his great redeeming excellences. Exclude this occasional reminiscence and all the sociology, which has not fire enough to blaze into the clear bright flame of poetry, and the volume of Miss Dargan's verses claims serious attention. More impulse and a finer gift of natural poetic speech are displayed by Mr. Masefield. The title-poem is dramatic in form and deals with the Spanish Armada. Although the subject has been a favorite one with many English poets, living and dead, Mr. Masefield can here confidently challenge comparison with the greatest, and gain by the comparison. In freshness of inspiration, dramatic insight, and comparative freedom from the ordinary English writer's parochialism on Spanish topics of the sixteenth century, Mr. Masefield's poem, "Philip the King," is worthy of a high place among the achievements of contemporary poets. It furnishes a good object-lesson of the way 'genius' can be original and still observe the rules. Mr. Yeats's yearning for a new poetic dispensation does not seem to have affected Mr. Masefield. Perhaps Mr. Yeats has not cared to meddle with the young English poets. J. J. D.

The Renaissance. By EDITH SICHEL. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $0.50.

It is no easy matter to give in 250 pages 16mo. a satisfactory account of such a movement in Europe as the Renaissance. A specialist like Miss Sichel will write above the level of the ordinary reader and an advanced student will find the treatment inadequate, owing to the limits imposed. The author shows a wide knowledge of the writers, painters and sculptors of Italy, of those of France, too, especially its writers, laudable or otherwise; but the long catalogue can receive but little elucidation, a few words, a sparkling remark and a skip to the next name. The painters and sculptors have but little cause of complaint. As a critic of the writers Miss Sichel is less satisfactory. She misses the quest of the schoolmen, which was truth, not "logical results," and gives undue credit to their degenerate successors. The corruption of manners following the Black Death, the confusion of mind and weakening of faith following divided papal allegiance, the increase of luxury consequent on the expansion of commerce, exerted a stronger force than did barbarism of expression among the schoolmen in turning Sybarites from the pursuit of truth to the cult of the beautiful. There is no distinction drawn in the book between the pagan and Christian renaissance. There is but little reference to the corruption of morals among those who belong to the former class, unless they happen to be cardinals or popes, and these receive more than their due. This is particularly true of Pius II whose heroic and pathetic death is worthy of record in a history of the Renaissance. Why is not Nicholas of Cusa mentioned among the German Humanists? Why is there not a single word about Ximenes and his university? Nor of the host of Spanish painters, architects, writers? Are they too clean and too Catholic? P. J. D.

Commentary on the Psalms. By REV. E. SYLVESTER BERRY. New York: Benziger Brothers. $2.00.

The new law, which obliges priests to read all the Psalms almost every week, has resulted in a number of excellent attempts to interpret the Vulgate version of the Psalms without a scientific reconstruction of the original text. Such endeavors will necessarily fail to satisfy the devotion of the few priests who are really desirous to know what the original Poet of Israel was inspired to say, and how he said it. To satisfy such inquirers, Father M'Sweeney's work on the Psalms is still of service. To most priests, however, what is important is to get some idea of the meaning of the Vulgate Psalter—the Gallican of St. Jerome—without any thought of the reconstruction of the original text, its meters and various Semitic characteristics. Such an idea of the meaning of the Vulgate Father Berry gives.

The Latin Vulgate is printed side by side with one of the editions of the Douay version. Lines and strophes are clearly marked off without any intricate system of strophic stricture in accordance with quantity or accent or both. The titles are neatly explained. Each psalm is preceded by a compact and illuminating synopsis. In the interpretation enough reference is made to the Hebrew text for the clearing up of the Vulgate and the great commentators are judiciously drawn up. The notes are so brief and yet full that they will be very serviceable to all priests who desire to say the Psalter with an understanding of its meaning, and yet have no time to bother with the variations between the Massoretic text and the ancient versions.

A few corrections should be made in a future edition of this work. For instance, it is scarcely fair to the thirteen Oriental rites in union with Rome to say that "the official text of the Church" is the Latin Vulgate. Trent decreed nothing about the authentic versions of the various rites that have sprung from the Byzantine, Syriac, Coptic, etc.; but merely made the Latin Vulgate to be the authentic version for the Latin rite. The purpose of Trent is clearly stated—"To make known which of the Latin editions of the Sacred Books that are in circulation should be held as authentic" (Session iv). Moreover, it would be well to state what revision of the Douay is used—Murphy's, Benziger's, etc.; certainly, we have not here the original Douay. Moreover, it is misleading to say: "Both texts are given with the spelling, punctuation, and use of capitals exactly as found in approved editions." Episcopal approbation has no direct bearing on spelling, punctuation and capitals; the proof-reader, Pro dolor! is given undue authority in these matters. Finally, to speak of the Latin of the Vulgate as impure is almost on a par with the Englishman's accusation that we Americans speak impure English. Vulgate Latin is pure, but it is the spoken Latin of the time and place of the translators. W. F. D.

I Gesuiti dalle Origini ai Nostri Giorni. Cenni Storici. P. Rosa, S.J. Roma: Civiltá Cattolica.

In some respects, if not in all, this is probably the best compendious history of the Society of Jesus that has yet appeared, based as it is upon the researches of the numerous experts who have been engaged upon the history of the Jesuits these twenty years or more. Abounding in interesting facts and bringing into relief the more important ones, it will serve as a valuable ready-reference book, while at the same time it is graced by a style and manner of treatment that will make it a very readable account of a very important phase of modern apostolic labor. But the author's aim is to present only a rapid survey of the work of the Society, and as such the book must be judged. He might have given us a more distinctive portrait of the Jesuit in the classroom or in the field of missionary labor, or he might have impressed the reader with the large share which the early Jesuits had in rolling back the tide of heresy that threatened to engulf the whole of Europe. To the latter service of the Society Macaulay alludes when he says that the Reformation, which in its first century felt itself secure on the shores of the Mediterranean, was unable in its second hundred years to hold the shores of the Baltic. But perhaps the author regarded this as beyond the scope of his work. He does, however, throw considerable light on the period of the temporary destruction and final resuscitation of the Society. The usefulness of this little volume would be increased by the addition of a general index. M. P. H.

Origin and Destiny of Imperial Britain. By J. A. Cramb. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

Germany, France, Russia and Islam. By Heinrich von Treitschke. With a Foreword by Geo. Haven Putnam. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

The two books which are here under consideration merit the utmost attention and careful reading, not so much for what they say, but rather on account of what they indicate. Professor Cramb has produced a masterpiece of English literature, a prose-epic with a noble theme, a theme none other than the vision of a world-wide empire. Von Treitschke, too, is no whit behind in inspiration, although the series of addresses which constitute the volume appearing under his name are more concrete in their application, and do not approach so near to the idealism of Professor Cramb. The fact remains, however, that both these writers, professors of history, the one a German, the other an Englishman, find their ideal in the same theme.

The points upon which these two historians disagree are of no great importance; their ground of agreement is vitally important and if either may be said to express the opinion of his nation the lines of contact are such that they will affect the welfare of both the empires concerned. As a matter of fact Cramb voiced, in the first place, the ideals of the imperialistic party in England, and, secondly, that spirit which is associated to a considerable extent with the modern English universities, and the same may be said to a certain extent of Treitschke. Both have a great deal to say of God and divine destiny, and both, upon examination, have rather vague conceptions of what God is: a God evolved from the inner consciousness of man is the nearest approach to the apparent concept of either.

The ultimate summary of both Cramb and Treitschke is bound up with Protestantism. By Protestantism came "spiritual freedom and enlargement of soul"; both the writers have too much scorn and contempt for the Catholic Church to condescend to hate, and both, consciously or unconsciously, show how well-nigh impassable is the gulf between modern Protestantism and the Catholic Church. This, after all, is the all-important question. The war is not going to last for ever. When it is over we shall all have to settle down to repair the breaches made in civilization. If these two historians are right in their forecasts, are Catholics to drop out of the progress of the German and British empires? Are Catholicism and progress incompatible? Yet this is what both Cramb and Treitschke imply, though in no crude manner, but with a subtle appeal to the finer feelings of patriotism. Ultramontanism, Jesuitism, Romanism are the enemy, and freedom and national greatness are the outcome of man's revolt against these, and the realization of his own conscious superiority to all creeds, dogmas and formulas. Meanwhile, the finer element of Britain is drawing closer to the Church, which shows either that Cramb's theories are untenable or that the British Empire is on the decline. H. C. W.

Institutiones Theologiæ Fundamentalis Quas in Usum Auditorum Suorum Accomodavit Aemil. Dorsch, S. Theologiæ in Universitate Œnipontana Professor. Vol. II, De Ecclesia Christi. Neo-Eboraci: F. Pustet. $3.50.

Father Dorsch has produced a treatise upon the Church which combines as far as possible the freedom of the lecture style with the conciseness and orderly arrangement of the text-book. It will consequently be of value and interest to the reader seeking to widen his knowledge of this important subject no less than to the student consulting it in preparation for his future work. The thought and expression are always clear. Historic retrospects are ample, but not diffuse, while account is taken of modern difficulties. Thus the genuineness of the texts, Tu es Petrus, etc. and Euntes ergo docete, etc., is carefully vindicated and recent references are given to the question of St. Peter's stay at Rome. Practical suggestions are made for using in various ways the arguments drawn from the notes of the Church. Questions such as that of the mystical body of the Church are beautifully treated. Classical sources too have been amply laid under contribution and modern references are not neglected. The book can be heartily recommended. J. H.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

In the Catholic Mind for April 8 is published the address on "Catholic Sociology" that the Editor of AMERICA delivered at Baltimore in February. He shows that the Church has always been, and now is, the only teacher of true sociology. When Dr. G. F. Williams, of Washington, asserted before a Congressional Committee that "Cardinal" Newman was once "mulcted to the extent of 12,000 English pounds" for using "scurrilous" and libelous language, Mr. Paul Bakewell examined the statement, and his answer is entitled "Newman's Alleged 'Scurrility'" and is the second article in the present number of the Catholic Mind. "Why don't Catholics go to hear 'Billy' Sunday?" is a question often asked just now. Father Patrick H. Casey, S.J., here gives an excellent reason why.

"Dr. Syn" (Doubleday, $1.25) is a rollicking tale of Romney Marsh, in Kent, the smugglers and the King's men, a parson who was not a parson at all, and a mulatto. The story is quite one of the old sort, with plenty of thrills, and is a complete change from the plethora of dreary fiction with which we have been overwhelmed. Smugglers have no "problems."——In the "Ex-seminarian, or Plain Talks for Plain People." by Will W. Whalen (Mission Press, Techny, Ill., $1.00), the incidents are many and the emotions varied. A fuller motivation, giving depth to the characters and linking the events more adequately, would impart greater strength and distinction to the author's vivid imagination.——How that mighty hunter, Allan Quatermain, managed to crowd into his life such a multitude of thrilling adventures is truly marvelous. H. Rider Haggard, his tireless biographer, has now published, under the title "Allan and the Holy Flower" (Longmans, $1.35), the story of all the perils into which Quatermain's passion for orchids led him. Those who have conscientiously read the author's forty other novels and romances will have little trouble in forecasting the happy issue of the present quest.

Mr. Gustav Gottlieb Wenzlaff's "An Outline of the Fundamentals of Psychology" (Chas. Merrill Co., New York) covers a broad field. The author's aim is to present in a clear and concise manner all the proper psychological phenomena; and though at times he seems to sacrifice clearness to conciseness he has attained his rather difficult purpose with considerable success. Practically all the important questions of psychology are touched upon and the many theories advanced in explanation of the hard problems of the subject are at least noted. The book is scarcely intended for the advanced student, yet no one else will be able to fill in the details necessary for a clear understanding of all the author says. The best chapters are those that deal with the experimental side of psychology. In the few lines devoted to the most important question of the freedom of man's will, the point at issue is hopelessly confused. Mr. Wenzlaff treats scholasticism with respect, but his index gives scant recognition to Catholic psychologists. Father Maher has by no means been supplanted.

In "The American Girl" (Harper's, $0.50) Miss Anne Morgan has written a useful little book. She discusses, from the purely natural point of view, the education, responsibilities, recreation and future of her countrywomen. Her suggestions are sound; and for women of her own class, for its appeal and interest are mainly for them, it compresses into a brief space much wholesome and sane advice. Catholics will find in it a good deal that is helpful. The essential lack in the book is its careful avoidance of religion, although the whole tenor of its teaching is quite free from anti-religious bias. We wish Miss Morgan had been wiser or braver.

Longmans, Green & Co. have just issued a new impression of the works of the Abbé Constant Fouard, as translated into English with the author's sanction and cooperation by George F. X. Griffith. The set, which sells for the reduced price of $7.50, comprises six volumes: "The Christ, the Son of God," in two volumes, "Saint Peter and the First Years of Christianity," "Saint Paul and His Missions," "The Last Years of Saint Paul," and "Saint John and the Close of the Apostolic Age." It would be hard to overpraise the Abbé Fouard's work. We should like to see it make its way into every seminary, every rectory, and every Catholic family. Apart from its literary and scientific value, which is by no means slight, it would inevitably make for a more intelligent and more enthusiastic appreciation of the Faith.

Here are some five-cent pamphlets recently issued by the Irish Messenger, all of which can be obtained from the International Catholic Truth Society, 407 Bergen Street, Brooklyn: Father McDonnell's meditations on "Our Lady of Dolors" and new editions of his devotional pamphlets on "The Holy Hour," "Scenes from the Passion" and of his novena of meditations on St. Joseph. Father George C. Hungerford Pollen, S.J., has a good paper on the "Domestic Virtues," "S. M. M.," a booklet of prayers and stories entitled "Easter with Christ and His Friends"—for His young friends in particular. The Countess de Courson writes with enthusiasm about "The Soldier Priests of France." Father Edward Masterson, S.J., contributes an equally timely paper on "The Ethics of War." E. Leahy has out a new edition of his "Life of St. Patrick" and a particularly useful pamphlet entitled "How Eileen Learned to Keep House." An anonymous author gives a sketch of "The Little Flower of Jesus," and Gerald O. Sherrard tells "How to Work a Laborer's Cottage Garden" in a climate like Ireland's.

"In the Day of Battle" (Longmans, $0.90), by the Right Reverend H. L. Paget, D.D., Bishop of Stepney, is the answer to a request on the part of the Anglican Bishop of London that his fellow-bishops apply the Lord's Prayer to actual war conditions. So Bishop Paget wrote these seven essays on the seven petitions. All that a Catholic desiderates is the Catholic flavor, for "Give us this day our daily bread" means much more to us than to this Anglican bishop. The war-time thought it suggests to him is that the idle rich should give over idleness and take to toil. Then there will be food enough for all to eat. But the thought this petition suggests to the French priest in the trenches is to get the men of his regiment to receive Holy Communion—the "supersubstantial Bread."

"In the Service of the King" (Putnam, $1.25), is by Joseph B. Dunn, who seems to be an Episcopalian clergyman of the broad school of Christianity. At any rate, what he calls "A Parson's Story" gives the experiences of a minister in the country, the town and the city. A fixed creed such as the Catholic is an abhorrence to his hero. It is a vague idea of the King that appeals and does the work of conversion. Conversion means to love the King, but just what that means is hard to find out by reading this story. For this service of the King is a principle of unity of faith that the parson would allow to be quite consistent with any and all religions. His is the broadness of Hensley Henson, Dean of Durham: "The Spirit of Truth is in all religions or in no religion." The book is introduced by Betty O'Connor: this name together with that of Joseph Dunn, sets us thinking.

"In der Schule des Evangeliums" (Herder, $0.70), by Herman J. Clodder, S.J., and Karl Haggeney, S.J., is the first in a series of seven small volumes which are designed to offer priests and seminarians solid matter for mental prayer. After an excellent introduction treating of the value and the method of meditation, twenty-two sets of points are given, based upon the first four chapters of St. Matthew. His is the only Gospel to be used in the work, so all "harmonizing" will be avoided. A new translation of the evangelist's text has been prepared and they follow the words of the Gospel verse by verse.

Elizabeth A. Reed's worthy purpose in writing "Hinduism in Europe and America" (Putnam, $1.25), she explains, is to present a "correct view of this corrupt cult" and to furnish American women "with some scientific data concerning the real purpose of the system into which they are being so adroitly drawn." With the money of these deluded creatures, heathen temples are being erected in our large cities, and the priests of this abominable superstition, who are called Swamis, make helpless slaves of our Occidental Krishna worshippers. But those who stand in direst need of a book like this will probably be the last to read it.

EDUCATION

A Papal Document for Teachers

A LETTER was recently sent from the Vatican to the American Cardinals. It contains important references to the teachers in all our schools and colleges. It is a direct expression of appreciation on the part of the Holy See for the encouragement and support given to the Association of the Holy Childhood. In it Pope Benedict XV expresses his "lively and strong desire" to see this undertaking established "in every school and college of the United States and Canada." As a conclusive argument to awaken in particular the interest of our teachers in this work he strongly insists upon its high educational value. The citations here given are taken from the document addressed by the Papal Secretary to His Eminence Cardinal O'Connell, in the name of the Sovereign Pontiff. He writes:

> His Holiness, while continuing to show toward this pious work the paternal benevolence so generously bestowed upon it by his immediate predecessor of holy memory, has not failed to manifest his own lively and strong desire that the Association of the Holy Childhood be established in every school and college of the United States and Canada. His Holiness, moreover, calls attention to the fact that this society is not only helpful to the missionaries in making our dear Lord known to millions of pagan children, but also most useful in the sound moral education of Catholic youth.

This last point would seem to be sufficiently obvious in itself. Yet Pope Benedict XV, like his predecessor, has not failed to bring it into special prominence. "It will admirably contribute to their good education," was the pithy recommendation given by Pope Pius X. While therefore counting upon the "sturdy and valued support" of cardinals and bishops, the present Holy Father "confidently" looks to see their efforts seconded "above all by the teachers, in whose zeal and true Christian charity he places the greatest hopes." The application could not be made more directly.

Educational Advantages

It is the apathy of Catholics for Catholic causes that must primarily be combated everywhere in the Catholic classroom. To correct this weakness it is evident that we must begin with the children. We must teach them the significance of their mission as Catholics. We must implant in them zeal for the salvation of souls and the propagation of their Holy Faith. We must bring home to them the important lessons of unselfishness and sacrifice. We must prepare them to labor for the promotion of Catholic interests in the missions afar as well as in the extension of the Church at home. We must instruct them to rely upon prayer no less than upon material means for their future service to mankind. For all these purposes the Holy Childhood will prove itself of incalculable value, if prudently and zealously fostered according to the mind of the Holy See.

From a civic and social point of view, it is equally important for the Catholic educator to have at command this splendid means of preparing his pupils to take in due course of time an active, intelligent and Catholic interest in public undertakings. "It is a work," as Cardinal O'Connell rightly says, "that not only benefits those who receive financial aid from the Society, but it also helps to train our young people to take an active and broad interest in charitable work." It is thus, therefore, that we can hope to fill the ranks of our Ozanam societies, our conferences of St. Vincent de Paul and of all the Catholic organizations engaged in the countless enterprises of Christian charity and zeal. It is to be noted that the countries most advanced in Catholic social and civic organizations are likewise, as a rule, most conspicuous for their support of the Holy Childhood.

New Zest for Old Studies

There is still another consideration of no slight importance. The promotion of this work, intelligently and tactfully undertaken, will lend new zest to the class-room studies. Thus in the lessons devoted to geography the unfamiliar foreign countries will now mean more than merely Asia or Africa, China, India or Japan, as it has been well said. "They are part of the Lord's vineyard." The children have no longer a purely remote and impersonal interest in the strange names of distant cities, streams and mountains. They are taught to understand the interests of their holy religion involved here. They not only behold these lands with the eyes of Christ, as fields white for the harvest, but they realize how their own alms and daily prayers, as part of the world-wide work of the Holy Childhood, are active here, accomplishing great things for the glory of God.

There is in all this no fiction, no mere imagining. They are in very truth uplifting the hand of the missionary as it pours the saving waters; they are building out of their own funds the schools and asylums for their little brothers and sisters far away; they are sending forth the catechist upon his labors for souls and are seeking, with the good Samaritans of Christian charity, for the infants abandoned by their pagan parents. Along the banks of the Ganges and the Nile, in the streets of Algiers and Pekin, and in our own Indian missions nearer home, they are constantly at work, filling Heaven with souls. Through them their little charges, saved from death or slavery and from darkest paganism, are being taught the Gospel truths and the ways of God's commandments in as many languages as the Apostles were heard to speak when the Holy Ghost descended upon them on the first great Pentecost Day.

Similar opportunities will present themselves in other classes. Special text-books have even been prepared to serve as aids to teachers in their various branches. (Mission Press, Techny, Ill.) Thus, as Cardinal Gibbons says, will the Holy Childhood "foster both the spirit of self-sacrifice and the apostolic mission spirit." It will lend new zest to old studies and will prepare our children for active Catholic enterprise in the future.

Doubly Educational

There is another reason, already hinted at, why teachers, as a class, and all interested in the training of children must necessarily take a special delight in this work. It has the peculiar advantage of being doubly educational. It educates our children at home, and through their sacrifices, alms and prayers, it helps to educate in thousands of orphanages, schools and workshops the otherwise abandoned children in pagan countries and makes of them new apostles for their own tribes and races.

We are here, therefore, presented with the opportunity of accomplishing a vast educational mission. The Holy Childhood not merely unites our own children about their one true Head, the Divine Christ Child, but gathers to His love the children of foreign lands, moulding them all to His likeness, and thus fulfilling the supreme aim of Christian education. It advances our children in the virtues most required for effective Catholic work and raises up apostles to Christ "from the land of the east and from the land of the going down of the sun." Cardinal Gibbons surely voiced a common conviction when he wrote: "To have the children of Christian lands securing the blessings of Faith to the children of pagan lands is an inspiration from Heaven itself."

We are living in the days of educational fads and fallacies. Here is a true, solid educational factor urged upon us, from an educational point of view, by the Holy See. No other inducement, it is true, should be needed for our hearty cooperation than the often and ardently expressed desire of successive Pontiffs of the Church, and the almost incredible good accomplished by the Association itself in the salvation of millions of souls, but the fact that we are likewise satisfying our own educational interest in the training of God's little ones will lend additional zest to a work undertaken in obedience to the wish of the Vicar of Christ.

For All Classes

It may be mentioned, in conclusion, that no class of children will be found so poor that it can not receive the advantage of this training. A diocesan director tells us of a conversation with a first-grade teacher of a large parochial school. Without any pressure whatsoever she had collected the handsome sum of fifty dollars from her little charges during one school term.

> Upon the tip of my tongue was the observation: "You evidently have a very well-to-do class of children." She read my thought and, quick as a flash, said: "I know what you have in mind. No, my pupils do not come from wealthy or even comfortable homes. Two-thirds of the little ones have their lunch at a near-by day nursery." "Which means," I added, "that their poor mothers go out to work." "Exactly," she replied.

Here is the material out of which true Catholic men and women are made. Those pennies, so generously sacrificed, were more to them, in proportion, than a million dollars to Carnegie. If our well-to-do classes in so many schools and colleges can be taught to give in like measure, according to their means, our missions may well look forward to a hopeful future, and the Church to a generation of Catholics such as the world sadly needs to-day.

Joseph Husslein, S.J.

SOCIOLOGY

Your "Kid Brother"

YOU didn't know you had one? Oh, yes, you have; and not one only, but dozens of them. That group of chaps fighting over their ball game among the rocks and refuse of the vacant lot, they are your brothers. That gang of young "toughs" swirling around the street corner to get away from the "cop," they are your brothers. That pathetic group of voluble little liars trying to hoodwink the judge in the juvenile court, they are your brothers, too. Perhaps it doesn't make your bosom swell with pride to acknowledge them, but acknowledge them you must, if you wish to claim kinship with that Elder Brother who is not ashamed to call them His.

Now if you had sufficient tact and sympathy to win the confidence of these youngsters, you would find that they are composed of plain, uncontrolled human nature, lacking no element of that unpromising composition which is the raw material of heroes and saints. You would find much good in them, and learn that most of them really prefer being good to being bad. You would realize, if you never did before, why "Lead us not into temptation" was inserted in the prayer of prayers. And you would discover in almost every one of them a certain something which, under your hands, would act as a leaven, transforming the whole boy into such a younger brother as your bosom would swell with pride to acknowledge, especially on that day when you could present him to his Elder Brother and yours, confident of hearing the words, "Well done!"

The Chief Need

Too many little brothers are going wrong, and too few big brothers know or care where they are going. This is especially true of Catholics, in regard both to the little brothers who are on the wrong track and to the big brothers who are asleep at the switch. There are many admirable Catholic institutions and organizations wrestling with this problem of juvenile delinquency. They want to go to the root of the matter, but for lack of means can but pluck and prune at the branches bearing evil fruit. By "means" they do not indicate only, or even chiefly, money, but men. They want Catholics to know that about two-thirds of the children brought before juvenile courts in the cities of this country are Catholics, and that most of these are boys. They want Catholic men to develop a social conscience that will spur them on to giving their personal service toward correcting the conditions underlying these facts. They are calling on you to acknowledge these unfortunate little brothers of yours, and to reach out a helping hand to deliver them from evil.

The Origin of Evil

The evil of this condition lies chiefly in the fact that, in crowded districts, so many boys are turned out of such homes as they have upon the streets of the city, to find there what companionship and occupation they may. They are turned out of discipline, of control, of correction, of occupation, through the carelessness, irresponsibility or incapacity of their parents, many of whom are constantly at grips with poverty, and are therefore not to be too harshly judged. There is nothing to prevent these boys from following their natural tendency toward mischief, their love of excitement, their instinct for companionship, no matter where they lead. They easily form "gangs" dominated by irresponsible, vicious, sometimes even criminal, youths. By a perversion of their innate capacity for hero-worship, they follow and imitate these captains of evil; for want of decent and harmless occupations, they busy themselves first with mischief and rowdyism, then with infractions of police regulations, and finally, only too often, with the commission of some crime. At any of these stages they may be brought into the juvenile court, and here they meet, usually for the first time, with some kindly and intelligent efforts to protect and reform them. In this great work Catholics are well represented by able and devoted men and women, yet it is from these that we hear the plain truth that their efforts must be expended to repair a damage already done, much of which could have been avoided if there were men to devote themselves to the work of prevention. There is need of this work in every parish in the land. The mute though gripping appeal that is made to every heart by the sight of a little brother hurrying heedlessly to the devil, should rouse every Catholic man who is fitted for the task to do his share toward preventing this waste and loss of men.

Means of Reform

But how? you will ask? It is clear that what these boys suffer from is the constant force and pressure of bad influences, and an almost total lack of influences that are good. Remove them as much as possible from these bad influences, and substitute good influences. Both objects will be accomplished by the same means; for it is evident that every time you add an hour to the account of "Well-spent" you prevent the addition of an hour to "Spent-ill." The good influence required is your personal influence, executed with the utmost tact and delicacy. No man can, in any sense of the word, be "too good" for this work, in intellect, in education, in social position, in business experience. In fact the more of these things you can bring with you to the labor, the more will you be able to do for the cause, provided always that your heart is in the right place and your motives are pure. Perhaps you have received a goodly portion of life's blessings only that you may share them with these younger brothers who have received so little.

The Ozanam Association

Inspiration and encouragement may be drawn from the Ozanam Association of New York. Founded by sixty Catholic laymen in 1908, under the active patronage of His Eminence Cardinal Farley, and assisted by the General Conference of the Society of Saint Vincent de Paul, this association now has six club-houses in various parts of the city where the need is greatest. These elder brothers have not been asleep at the switch; by their personal service thousands of boys have been shunted off the wrong track onto the right track that leads to self-respect, good living, and decent, useful citizenship. For the rowdy, sometimes criminal, occupations of the street corners they have substituted the games and exercise of the cheerful rooms and gymnasiums of their club-houses; for the vacant lots and docks of the city, they have substituted the use of athletic fields and armories; for the bad influence of gangs and the leadership of young criminals, they have substituted the good influence of their clubs and the spirit of religion and the leadership of their own Christian manhood.

These men are doing their work. Are you doing yours? Without doubt there is a work for you to do. It is not necessary to start with sixty men, or to form an association, or to secure a club-house immediately. If the idea of "doing something for the boys" has got hold of you, it has probably also got hold of two or three others in your parish. Find out who these others are; get together; go to the pastor and explain your idea; he will tell you the boys that need you; and it will not take long to find some means of providing for them. Write to the Ozanam Association, 5 Beekman street, New York, and get the officers to tell you how they did it. In this way you will in a few days have the benefit of their experience of seven years.

The Right Man

It takes a real, all-round man to do this work. These rough-and-ready citizens of the streets will have nothing to do with shams and imitations. If you hope to succeed, you must have insight into human nature and sympathy with it; you must be eager to justify your pride in being a Catholic by transforming these boys from being a reproach to the Church into being a credit to her; you must, as an American citizen, be so much interested in your city, your State, your country, that you will give some part of your time and ability to the task of making good citizens out of unpromising material; you must understand clearly that your holding your place in the highest fellowship of all is conditioned upon your acknowledging your fellowship with these "little ones." Are you qualified for this service? Then turn and look your younger brother in the face; reach out your hand, and speak to him.

Nelson Hume.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Missions to non-Catholics have taken a decidedly new and novel turn. A zealous Redemptorist, Rev. Charles J. Burger, has just given a week's instruction in Catholic doctrine to the Protestant deaf-mutes of Pittsburg. The experiment was a decided success; the services were well attended, and the audience was most attentive. It is to be hoped that this work will be extended throughout the United States, for many of these Protestant deaf-mutes are the offspring of Catholic parents. These afflicted children are victims of circumstances. Catholics neglected to attend to them, Protestants were only too glad to wheedle them into their fold. Indeed in some cases the latter obtained zealous "preachers" from the ranks of the deaf and dumb children of Irish Catholic parents.

The war is still keeping prohibition prominently before the public eye. England is now discussing the question with the usual British ardor. France has forbidden absinthe, thus sacrificing the yearly revenue of $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 derived from its sale. Berlin has forbidden the sale of strong intoxicants to soldiers. Russia took measures to restrict the drink evil over a year ago. Then it was that the Czar issued this rescript:

> I have come to the firm conviction that the duty lies upon me, before God and Russia, to introduce into the management of the State finances and of the economic problems of the country fundamental reforms for the welfare of my beloved people. It is not meet that the welfare of the exchequer should be dependent upon the ruin of the spiritual and productive energies of numbers of my loyal subjects.

In 1913 the revenue from the manufacture and sale of vodka, a Government monopoly, was $463,000,000, nearly one-fourth of the total revenue of the empire.

Some one disturbed over the critical attitude of young men of a scientific turn of mind toward the Bible writes the Outlook for guidance in dealing with problems raised. The whole answer is illuminating: this part of it is amusing:

> The old-time view regarded the Bible as an infallible book about religion, if not dictated to the writers as amanuenses of God, at all events imparted to them as private secretaries. The modern view regards the Bible as a book of religion. Religion is the life of God in the soul of man: the Bible is the expression of that life, by men of different temperaments and intellectual abilities.

This old-time view raises a smile; the new-time view knocks Protestantism to pieces and replaces the "infallible" guide by shifting quicksands. Agnosticisim and infidelity follow as the day the night. Such the glory of the "glorious" Reformation.

The decline of religious belief in countries long considered the stronghold of Protestantism is strikingly illustrated by a discussion now under way in Holland. The Dutch penal code provides that witnesses must be sworn, "according to the way prescribed by the religious creed to which the person belongs." There's the rub. Many Dutchmen have no creed. Commenting on the law a writer in the New York Evening Post remarks:

> All this was very well as long as all people were believers and an avowed atheist or an agnostic were exceptions, which caused an immense popular amazement. But the times in which Holland could be said to house religious people only are past now, and every census shows an increase in proportion of people belonging to no creed. Of course, such people are not inclined to attach any peculiar value to the words, "So help me God, the Almighty." Not believing in a God, they either refuse to take the oath or utter a mere formula, void of any significance.

In other words Calvinism is losing its grip on the nation. The Dutch have become too jolly to believe that any among them are predestined to fire and brimstone.

"Irreligion decreases in direct ratio with the proximity of the firing line" is a truth formulated by a close observer of the French soldiers who are fighting in the present war. The Very Rev. A. Walsh, O.S.A., in an interesting paper he contributes to the March Irish Ecclesiastical Record, cites instances like the following to prove that a "Religious Revival in France" is now taking place. A chaplain writes:

> From a trench near at hand a little soldier, . . . crawling like a worm, makes headway toward his neighbor. He gets on without being hit by the fire, and is, at length, at the opening of the underground lodging of his Reverence the sergeant. Once there, with his nose in the ground, he calls in a whisper: "Are you there, Salvan?" "Yes," said the priest-sergeant. "What do you want? . . . If the Germans see you, you're done for." . . . "Could you hear my confession?" "Yes at once." "All right; but I can not go on my knees, they would knock over my skittles." "It is not necessary; stay as you are." And right there, leaning over his trench, where the priest-sergeant stood, the little fellow received God's pardon, and then made off, crawling slowly, slowly until he reached his post.

A soldier writes:

> They say there is no faith left in France; but you should assist at Mass in the open air or in some poor church ruined by the enemy's guns. You would then see what crowds there are. You would feel the sense of the faith that animates these men, so recollected during the Holy Sacrifice, and you would have been comforted by the sight. . . . We fight like lions, but, without the precious help from above, there is nothing achieved. And hence we are all praying. . . . Our return home is doubtless far off, but when it comes it promises a rich harvest for the faith. You will see how people are changed, and I believe that France will become worthy of her title, la fille aînée de l'Eglise.

If the votes of these soldiers when the fighting is over drive from office the clique of persecutors who have grown rich by plundering the Church, the war will have been a great blessing to France.

The clamor raised against the Sisters of the Good Shepherd by a few brawling fanatics has just called forth a splendid defence of these devoted women. A Lutheran of Omaha, who admits that he was filled with prejudices, determined to investigate a convent. Here is the result:

> Instead of a prison-like reform school, with wayward girls held to their tasks by rod and iron discipline, I found a place very much resembling any girls' school with dormitories—the only difference being the workrooms in connection. And for order, cleanliness and kindness in discipline, I doubt if any school averages higher. . . . We saw the girls at school and at work, inspected the laundry, sewing rooms, dining rooms, dormitories, infirmary, lavatories, kitchen, storerooms and parlors. And everywhere we saw the same perfect order and spotless cleanliness. Each girl has a separate bed, towel, soap, comb and brush, and dishes which she washes herself. All girls of school age must spend half of each day in study and recitation. Last year there were eight graduates from the eighth grade. Special attention is given to music and at present the girls have an orchestra of fifty pieces and a class of twenty beginners. A good library is also at their disposal.

After proceeding in this strain for some time the writer closes his long letter with this sentence: "After seeing the work these gentle, refined ladies are doing for humanity it is hard to understand how any one can stoop to make their labors greater by petty annoyance and abuse."

In the early morning of April 2, there died in St. Vincent's Hospital, New York City, a man whose life was a shining example of unselfish devotion to the education of boys. The Reverend James Smith, S.J., was born in New York sixty-five years ago. On completing his preliminary education, he entered the Society of Jesus and was ordained at Woodstock, at the end of the usual course of studies. Soon after ordination he entered the classroom and never left it again, for more than a month or so, until he was completely broken in health by years of hard, unremitting labor. For some time he lectured first on philosophy and then on theology at Woodstock; thence he was transferred to Holy Cross, Worcester, where for a decade or more he taught philosophy with most remarkable success. He was master of both the art and science of pedagogy. His intellect was clear; his soul, sympathetic; his zeal, unbounded. He gave his best to his pupils, striving with all his talents to make them Christian gentlemen, and they in turn repaid him by a loyalty and reverence that was akin to hero worship. Throughout New England and wherever there is a Holy Cross man, the name of Father Smith is in benediction: it stands for all that is noble in man. He is dead, but he lives in his work and in the memory of a host of manly, upstanding men whose souls he touched into a higher life with the consummate skill of a master. This is his reward on earth: there is another and greater one in heaven for this choice spirit who, scorning the bewitchery of folly, fled the face of man, and in the silence and obscurity of the lecture hall, dedicated himself to the noble ideal of instilling into the souls of youth all that is high in life, lofty in thought and noble in aspiration.

NOW IN PRESS

Pioneer Laymen of North America

A new book by the Rev. T. J. Campbell, S.J., telling the fascinating story of the adventurous Cartier, Menendez, Champlain, De La Tour, Maisonneuve, Le Moyne, and Radisson.

The many admirers of Father Campbell's historical works will find in these sketches companion pictures to his popular "Pioneer Priests of North America." They are condensed and somewhat rapid narrations of the lives of a number of men who were conspicuous in the days when civilization was being brought to this continent: explorers, founders of states and colonies, governors of provinces, commandants of forts, captains of vessels, officers of the regular army, leaders of the reckless coureurs de bois, daring traders who, in the interests of commerce, ventured alone among the savages, besides pirates, filibusters and peaceful colonists. They are mostly Frenchmen, or native-born Canadians, but there are a few Spaniards, an occasional Englishman, and towards the end, a distinguished man who is frequently put down as Scotch, but who constantly insisted on his Irish origin. A great State on the Pacific slope claims him as its founder. The field of their operations was extensive, for it stretched from ocean to ocean and from Hudson Bay as far south as Brazil.

Some of them are ideal heroes and may be proposed as models; the glory of others is sadly tarnished; and a few are subjects of reproach. From all, however, lessons of conduct may be learned, and, here and there, in the course of a narrative, it is possible to correct certain false appreciations of facts and motives which a class of biased writers have fastened on American history. The series is arranged chronologically so that the various sections connect more or less with one another.

To Teachers

Are you looking for a Text-Book of the highest efficiency that will prove an important adjunct in class life?

A rapidly increasing number of our Colleges and Schools, all over the country are using AMERICA as supplementary reading in connection with their various courses.

One large college already is using more than ONE HUNDRED COPIES EACH WEEK.

Its carefully-written pages and well-developed thought, the breadth of its articles, the timeliness of its editorials, and the clear-cut divisions of the Review, render it a valuable asset in forming the pupils' minds upon the great questions of the day. To the Professor of Ethics, Oratory, Political Economy, Sociology, Pedagogy, Literature, Composition, History, Apologetics and kindred branches it affords an excellent store of illustration.

Precisely because AMERICA gives an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life, is the reason why we want the NATIONAL CATHOLIC WEEKLY in the hands of every Catholic student in the Universities, Colleges and High Schools of the country, as a means to clarify and extend the teaching of the classroom. To aid in this work we have made

Applicable to Teachers and Students in Catholic Schools only.

Send at once for the circular that will explain in detail the comprehensive viewpoint and importance to both teacher and student of this most attractive and advantageous program.

Let us hear from you to-day so that no further issue of the National Catholic Weekly Review may be lost to your class. Begin immediately so that besides instructing them through the pages of AMERICA you may introduce them to the most universally quoted Catholic paper in the English Language and have the reflex benefits of its use in the School felt in the Home.

Hundreds of Teachers and thousands of Pupils are being helped and inspired by its pages, which give a weekly record of Catholic achievement and a defence of Catholic doctrine built up by skilful hands in every region of the globe; an authoritative statement of the position of the Church in the thought and activity of modern life; removing traditional prejudice, refuting erroneous news and correcting misstatements about Catholic beliefs and practices.

Have You Actively Helped to Distribute the 127,000 COPIES OF THE CATHOLIC MIND That Have Been Circulated Since June Last?

These attractive pamphlets are now everywhere recognized among the most effective weapons the militant Catholic has. Published on the eighth and twenty-second of the month. The price is nominal. Each number contains articles of permanent value, entire or in part, on some question of the day, given in popular style. These articles are taken from the best sources, and the rule of selection is the best to be had, so that subscribers may keep each number for frequent reading and reference.

NUMBER 7, VOL. XIII, APRIL 8, 1915.

Those who think that sociology is a very modern invention with which the Church is quite unacquainted should read, in the current CATHOLIC MIND, the address on by the Rev. Richard H. Tierney, S.J.

CATHOLIC SOCIOLOGY

G. F. Williams, D.D., of Washington, recently accused John Henry Newman of being "mulcted" in $60,000 for using "scurrilous" language. In

NEWMAN'S ALLEGED "SCURRILITY"

Mr. Paul Bakewell disproves the assertion. The issue concludes with a convincing paper by Father Patrick H. Casey, S.J., entitled "CATHOLICS AND 'BILLY' SUNDAY."

Courses Thorough. Methods Progressive. Excellent advantages in Music and Art
This Institution, one of Kentucky's famous boarding schools for girls, is situated on the L. & N. Railroad, two miles from historic Bardstown and thirty-eight miles from Louisville, the metropolis of the State. The climate advantages of the location can hardly be surpassed. Free from the extremes of heat and cold, as well as from malarial influences, the atmosphere is pure and invigorating at all seasons, affording opportunities for open-air exercise almost any day of the year. Parks and groves, shaded avenues, golf links, and an extensive campus furnished with basket ball, tennis courts, etc., add to the attraction of an out-door life.
The buildings, with a frontage of a thousand feet, too extensive to be represented in a single picture, contain study and class rooms, laboratories, libraries, music rooms, dormitories, refectories, recreation halls, a spacious auditorium and a fine museum, all arranged with a view not only to the physical comfort and convenience of the students but to what is best and highest in education. Terms moderate. For catalogue, address THE DIRECTRESS, Nazareth, Kentucky.

Benziger's Handy Parish Outfit fills a want that has long been felt. Many Priests and Sisters would like to respond to the demands made upon them for religious goods and books by people who do not know where else to procure them. Our plan will enable Priests and Sisters to keep a well-selected and varied assortment in a handsome Cabinet in an orderly manner, to sell at reasonable prices, leaving a fair margin of profit.

The Cabinet shown in the illustration is of oak, natural finish, and may be stood on a shelf or table or hung on a wall in the reception room or office of the rectory or in the Sisters' house. It has a glass door, with lock and key. The glass door allows a display of the goods, which will be a reminder to callers of their possible requirements. With each Cabinet is furnished a Detailed Selling Price-List of all the goods in the Cabinet as well as other goods that might be added, with the selling prices, each article tagged and numbered, so that there can be no confusion, and selling is a simple matter. When the supply of any article is exhausted, replenishing is easy, by ordering from the price-list.

Each "Parish Outfit" contains "My Prayer-Book" and other books by Father Lasance as well as copies of Benziger's Standard Fifty Cent Library and Benziger's Thirty-five Cent Juvenile Library.

Real Mattress Cleanliness

BED ticking is a sieve-like fabric, which allows foreign matter to filter through and to become a fixture in the mattress.

Re-covering such bedding is an uncleanly makeshift which merely does away with part of the trouble.

What is needed is an antiseptic washable

Excelsior Quilted Mattress Pad

which really solves this vexing problem.

It protects the mattress and adds to its life.

Made of bleached Muslin padded with white wadding—wash easily—dry light and fluffy as new.
